Keeping up with the goings on of my friends back home, I noticed a lot of comments about the Campus Antiwar Network (CAN) and an issue regarding the Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI), wherein CAN is organizing a debate regarding whether divestment in Israel is a proper course of action, but SAFI refuses to join the debate.

As someone who deeply cares about the conflict raging in the Middle East, I know that American voices are often louder and have more sway on Middle Eastern politics than all of the ethnic and political groups here do, combined. I have come across border walls, large separation barriers that are pending construction, awaiting aid from America.

My presence has been requested as a human shield, as a holder of that blue and silver passport standing in a house that could keep it from being demolished, when any Palestinian or Israeli would just be pulled out, beaten, and arrested in front of the house being bulldozed. Even from Palestine and my travels in Mediterranean, I keep abreast of American politics, as do most locals; I watched President Obama's entire inaugural speech broadcast in a badly dubbed, booming Arabic voice in a Bethlehem restaurant.

For me, the conflict here is not about strong words and flaring emotions across a lecture hall stage, but whether my Israeli family is going to be rocketed, whether my Palestinian friends will be bombed, and whether I will be shot at or grenaded by Israeli military while shopping for vegetables or peacefully demonstrating, again.

It isn't a conflict about ideals, ideas, or preferences, though they are still important, but rather it has come down to survival, safety, and security in many places, where bombs still drop, sink taps run dry, sewage piles up untreated, and homes still get demolished.

I was surprised to hear that SAFI would not debate CAN. As two groups with similar goals for peace in the Middle East, I found it hard to believe that they won't be approaching each other at the podium.

Peace is a common desire, though there are different routes to finding that peace; Israel has had a very hard time finding it lately, and as supporters of the State of Israel, I would think that American divestment would have an influence on Israel and thus be of interest to SAFI.

As a fellow Jew who grew far from Zionist beliefs yet still keeps Israel and my family there very close to my heart, I decided to write an open letter to SAFI. As a peace activist and resister of the military occupation and the de facto genocide that is occurring,

I wanted to send these words in the hope that as a major influence for Israel and Palestine, Americans with differing perspectives can still cooperate in order to help guide the Middle East towards peace, one debate at a time.

Fallon hopes to bring laughs to the Calvin

Stand-up act from 'Late Night' host

BY ANGELA STASIOWSKI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Like the miniature microbes that populate our world, comedian Jimmy Fallon is everywhere. The comedian turned actor turned talk show host has taken a turn at nearly every manifestations of popular media.

On Saturday April 18 at 8p.m., the viral comic comes to the Calvin Theater in Northampton to spread his humor.

Fallon grew up in New York as an avid fan of Lorne Michael's late night production, "Saturday Night Live." Fallon's semi-strict Catholic parents allowed him to watch the "clean" segments of the raunchy television program.

In past interviews, Fallon has said of his upbringing that, "Sometimes I wish I had a terrible childhood, so that at least I'd have an excuse."

From an early age, Fallon loved to make people laugh. At the age of two, he had already developed a repertoire of celebrity impersonations.

He began pursuing serious comedic aspirations at the age of 17, winning an open mic competition at his high school.

Despite his success, Fallon opted to attend college before pursuing stardom any further. He initially attended New York's College of Saint Rose as a computer science major, but later settled on communications. However, at only 15 credits short of graduation, Fallon dropped out and decided to follow bigger dreams.

Some of Fallon's first attempts at comedy were at The Improv Theater.

After performing there for a mere $7.50 a set, he again decided to raise his aim. In 1998, he auditioned for SNL.

In order to impress the show's producers, Fallon unleashed impressions of everyone from Jerry Seinfeld to Counting Crow's lead singer Adam Duritz. Thoroughly impressed by his raw talent, producers hired Fallon and he made his debut as a regular on Saturday Night Live during the 1998-1999 season.

On SNL, Fallon became well known for many of his recurring spots, not the least of which was the pseudo-informative "Weekend Update," which he wrote and starred in with Tina Fey.

He remained with SNL until 2005. Having found success in the television industry, the comedian tried his luck on a slightly larger scale.

In one of his more notable roles, Fallon starred beside Drew Barrymore for the 2005 production "Fever Pitch." The romantic comedy about Red Sox fanaticism, adapted from the Nick Hornby book of the same name, helped jumpstart his career as a big screen star.

Showing off his more serious side, Fallon also played a role in the Emmy-winning miniseries, "Band of Brothers."

Today, Fallen continues to keep himself busy in the film industry, starring beside Barrymore for a second time in the comedy "Whip It." Due out later this year, the movie also features Ellen Page of "Juno" fame.

Fallon's standup skills and imitations earned him hosting duties on MTV's Video Music Awards in 2002. During the program he managed to create a satirical medley of popular celebrities in which he seamlessly transitioned from the likes of Avril Lavigne to Enrique Iglesias.

Acting in major motion pictures and hosting award shows are simply not enough for the young comedian, however. In 2003, Fallon collaborated with his sister Gloria to pen the book, "I Hate This Place: The Pessimist's Guide to Life."

The publication serves essentially as an anti-self-help book, touting wisdom like, "Knock, and the door shall be slammed in your face."

Fallon's latest effort is no small production, either. The SNL alum has recently taken over Conan O'Brien's role as host of the NBC production "Late Night."

"Late Night with Jimmy Fallon" premiered earlier this year to the delight of SNL enthusiasts everywhere.

The show has gone through some serious changes since Conan O'Brien's days. The new house band, for example, is none other than eclectic hip-hop stars The Roots. Diehard "Late Night" fans will be relieved to know that the show still features the usual format of interviews, musical guests and standup segments.

Fallon's standup routines, both on "Late Night" and otherwise, generally consist of equal parts impersonations and audience interactions, with a dose of music thrown in for good measure. The multitalented funnyman even released an album on DreamWorks Records in 2002 entitled "The Bathroom Walls."

Like most of Hollywood, the comic is adamantly opposed to the war that is currently burdening the nation. Doing his part, he recorded "Carwash For Peace," a tune that calls for bubbles over bombs.

Though stand-up is no longer his primary form of comedic output, Fallon performs regularly at the Comedy Club in New York. He is currently performing at venues around the nation during his downtime from "Late Night."

His impersonations, musical or otherwise, are amusing in their ability to make even the parodied person laugh. It is clear he puts his all into every performance, committing to the role to the point of exhaustion. It is his stand-up that keeps the humorist grounded in his passion for comedy.

In short, after conquering television, cinema, literature, music and stand-up, Fallon has proved himself to be one of the most diversified men in show business.

Jimmy Fallon will be performing at the Calvin Theater on Sat., April 18 at 8 pm. Tickets are $ 32.50.

Jimmy Fallon has come a long ways since his days on "SNL." He has been in blockbuster hits and flops. But now he is the host of "Late Night" and on a tour during a filming break.

"Hannah Montana: The Movie" takes over ticket sales, and overall sales for the year continue to rise.

Cyrus shows her box-office supremacy

BY BEN FRITZ
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — Girl power and Good Friday combined to propel "Hannah Montana: The Movie" to the top of the weekend box office with $34 million in ticket sales.

The better-than-expected opening, along with a number of well-performing holdovers, continued the movie industry's solid results for box office in 2009. So far this year, box office revenue is up 17 percent and attendance is up 15 percent, thanks to a string of strong debuts.

Nonetheless, "Hannah Montana: the Movie" had an undeniably strong first weekend, especially given its relatively low budget. Most Hollywood insiders had pegged it to open in the $20-million range.

Although the audience was overwhelmingly made up of Cyrus' pre-teen girl fan base accompanied by their parents, Walt Disney Studios Motion Picture Group President Mark Zoradi noted that the film also attracted an older segment than expected, with a surprising number of teenagers coming to evening shows.

"That's what really drove this movie over $30 million," he said. "Montana's" Friday was particularly strong, as many kids and parents were off for the holiday.

Since many students are on Spring Break this week, Disney is counting on strong weekday grosses before "17 Again," starring "High School Musical" heartthrob Zac Efron, opens Friday and likely steals much of "Hannah Montana's" audience.

Last weekend's big opener, "Fast and Furious, declined 59 percent to $28.8 million, a typical drop for an action film. It continues to perform particularly well overseas, where it debuted at No. 1 in the U.K. and Russia and stayed No. 1 in Germany, Mexico, and Brazil for the second weekend in a row.

Universal's gambit to open a traditional summer film in early April has paid off handsomely, driven by young men and Hispanic audiences. After just 10 days, the domestic total for the fourth entry in the studio's action racing franchise is $118 million and the worldwide total is over $200 million.

Fogelson said he now expects "Fast and Furious" to reach a total worldwide gross of about $400 million, a healthy sum given its $85 million budget. The series' high was previously set by 2003's "2 Fast 2 Furious," which grossed $236 million.

The importance of journalists in the eyes of one filmmaker

BY RACHEL ABRAMOWITZ
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — "What happens when journalists aren't there to ask the difficult questions of politicians?"

That's just one concern Kevin Macdonald, the 41-year-old Scottish documentary filmmaker turned director, is raising with his new political thriller, "State of Play."

The movie, which stars Russell Crowe, Ben Affleck, Helen Mirren and Rachel McAdams, is set during these tumultuous times for the fourth estate. The backdrop for this tale of inside-the-Beltway conspiracy and intrigue is a Washington, D.C., newspaper, similar to The Washington Post, except without the benevolent Graham family as the owners, and it does capture the feeling of an industry in transition, perpetually under economic pressures from the outside, while inside a battle for supremacy reigns between the brash but unseasoned young bloggers and the traditional hard-charging gumshoe reporters.

Affleck, who plays an ambitious up-and-coming politician, and Macdonald tend to banter jocularly with talking about the seismic shifts in the media landscape, but they didn't make the film to dance on the grave of any institution. This is the kind of movie where the closing shot is a loving pan to newspapers traveling through the printing plant.

"It's the last hurrah for this analog technology. You look at it and it feels like this noble beast, the last lion in the wilderness," Macdonald says. "That's what got me interested in a film about journalism."

Over a lunch, on a windy day, at the otherwise completely deserted poolside of the Four Seasons Hotel, Affleck and Macdonald – who speak with exuberance and authority about what they see as the responsibilities and shortcomings of news-gathering organizations – resemble the dynamic between the film's main characters: Crowe's disheveled but tenacious reporter, Cal McAffrey, and Affleck's shiny bright congressman, Stephen Collins – old college pals who have grown apart while working for the public trust (albeit in different capacities) in the nation's capital.

Macdonald, who won an Oscar for his documentary "One Day in September," about the Munich Olympic massacre, before directing 2006's "The Last King of Scotland," is the rumpled one with shaggy hair and a journalist's zeal for blunt truth telling, tempered by his understanding of the Hollywood publicity machine. (He comes from a prominent filmmaking clan, both as the grandson of writer-director Emeric Pressburger, Michael Powell's collaborator on "The Red Shoes," and brother of prolific U.K. producer Andrew Macdonald.)

Looking trim in a peacoat, Affleck gives off an air of radiant health and tends to undercut his director's more earnest musings with good-natured jokes.

The film, based on the gripping 2003 six-hour British miniseries of the same name, begins with what seem to be unrelated events. A street kid is gunned down in an alley. A beautiful, young woman working on the Hill dies in a subway accident. While investigating the shooting for his newspaper, Crowe's journalist uncovers connections between the deaths – and what may be a larger government conspiracy involving a private, Halliburton-like military contractor – that could derail the career of his old buddy the congressman.

Making matters even more complicated, Crowe's character has had an affair with the congressman's wife, played by Robin Wright Penn. In a departure – and updating from the miniseries – McAdams plays a newbie blogger, more accustomed to pontificating than reporting, who finds herself paired with Crowe, who has major conflict-of-interest issues as the investigation delves deeper into his friend's past. Mirren plays the paper's acerbic top editor, caught between the financial demands of the paper and her desire to break big news and speak truth to power.

Crowe wasn't the original choice to play McAffrey. Brad Pitt initially was cast as the conflicted but dogged newsman and even made a dashing research visit to the Washington Post.

"It was the biggest thing that ever happened there," Macdonald says wryly.

"The biggest thing that happened at The Washington Post was that Brad Pitt went through?" Affleck asks. "Wow."

Macdonald is circumspect about what happened to Pitt, who dropped out a week before shooting was to commence in November 2007, which in turn led to Edward Norton, who was supposed to play the congressman, also leaving the project. Pitt was unhappy with the script and wanted to push until after the writers strike to allow for more rewrites. Universal threatened to sue the superstar for violating a pay-or-play deal, unless an appropriate replacement could be found.

"Basically, Brad and I sort of realized we were trying to make different films," says Macdonald, although along the way, a team of top screenwriters came in to work on the script, including Matthew Michael Carnahan ("The Kingdom"), Tony Gilroy ("Michael Clayton"), Billy Ray ("Breach"), as well as Macdonald's close friend, Peter Morgan ("The Queen"), who did uncredited rewrites.

The character of McAffrey "has to be somewhat inadequate-seeming," he adds. "He has to admire and look up to his friend and feel his friend has achieved what he hasn't. Imagining Brad Pitt in that role was very hard. That's why it didn't work out, why we couldn't quite make it fit. It wasn't organic. So when Russell came in, he could fit that."

Indeed, a portly Crowe appears in the film – a character choice that might be spot-on for depicting a slovenly journalist but not always the way movie fans like to see a leading man.

Asked about his star's unexpected girth, Macdonald says diplomatically: "It fits the part. The idea is that the character is somebody who's gone to seed. The choices (Russell) made, they fit with that. It wasn't exactly what myself and the studio imagined. In that case, it worked. One of the good things about Russell, he's an actor with no vanity."

But he's also an actor who takes great pride in what he puts up on screen, and, according to Macdonald, working with him isn't always the easiest experience.

"Russell is highly opinionated," the director says. "He is very smart, and he has his own ideas a lot of the time about how his character should be. Sometimes that would be great." He gives the example of Crowe deciding his character should always wear a pink breast cancer armband, in honor of his mother who died young of the disease and left him unable to connect emotionally, a character detail that

Story about fleeting profession

Kevin Macdonald fears the death of newspapers and the role of the reporter will affect the world in greater ways than people assume. His new movie, "State of Play," shows what a determined reporter can do.

"Things like that cumulatively have the impact," Macdonald says. "It's collaboration with Russell. He's not the kind of actor when you can say, 'Do it again, but turn your head 3 degrees to the left,' like you're a photographer. He has ideas about how he's going to do it, and it's hard sometimes to get him off that. He can be tough."

When Norton left, Affleck came in to play the politician and did his share of hands-on research, visiting the offices of Congressmen Patrick Murphy, D-Pa., Adam Smith, D-Wash., and Illinois Democrat Rahm Emmanuel, now President Barack Obama's chief of staff (and brother of Hollywood talent agent Ari Emmanuel, whose Endeavor represents Affleck). This said, Affleck carefully points out that his troubled politician isn't based on any one figure.

Although Affleck and Macdonald evince a kind of romantic fondness for the noble calling of ink-stained wretches, they come across little less impressed with the lives of elected officials. Everything was a bit smaller than he expected, says Affleck, including the offices. "You have this idea, here are the halls of power and you're going to walk in and there's going to be, like, trumpets, or horns are going to blow. None of them rival the offices of the great American CEOs with $2,000 trash cans."

Affleck admits he was wary about playing a politician on screen because of his history for being politically outspoken.

"There is some baggage I carry," he says. "Playing a political character, I was afraid there would be some carry-over. People wouldn't be able to see the character."

Although he once mused about going into politics, that infatuation apparently has passed – for now. "It's something that seems much less appealing to me now the more I'm exposed to it," Affleck says.

"That's a clear political denial. Next month expect his name on the ballot box for governor of California," Macdonald jokes.

"Even going around with all these congressman, it truly is full-time fundraising, with a little bit of politics thrown in. A lot of it is ugly, tawdry work. Maybe I'm not selfless enough," Affleck says. "I also like my life. I like it more than I ever have. I loved doing this movie. I don't have any desire to step outside of that at any time."

Of course, smart adult dramas, particularly ones like "State of Play," which cost a reported $60 million to make, are themselves an endangered species within the studio system; perhaps they're not quite on the gurney with print journalism, but as Affleck says: "Usually, if you're doing a movie like this, you're in a much smaller trailer."

Even Affleck, who saw the worst of tabloid journalism during his days dating Jennifer Lopez, sees the value of traditional news gathering organizations devoted to public service. "It's the horse and buggy thing," he says. "Newspapers are the horse and buggy, and they're now making cars. But I think the bigger danger is letting go of the horses and buggy entirely while not making sure we keep from them the things that were valuable to this culture – the history of excellence in journalism."

"We're making the movie sound like it's deadly serious," Macdonald offers. "It's a thriller with some comedy. The best movies are fun and make you think. Smart entertainment is the thing there's a shortage of."

Movies making bang for buck

Fox's "Dragonball: Evolution," which targeted young boys who wouldn't be caught dead at a "Hannah Montana" showing, didn't fare nearly as well. After receiving withering reviews and online disdain from fans of the Japanese anime series on which the movie was based, it opened to a weak $4.7 million.

Fox co-financed the film with Dune Entertainment and Ingenious Partners, liming its exposure on the approximately $25 million budget. "Dragonball" has performed better overseas, especially in Japan and China.

The weekend's third new film, "Observe and Report," also didn't make any waves. The dark comedy starring Seth Rogen opened to $11.1 million, on the low end of what was expected. Warner Bros. and Legendary Pictures co-financed the $18 million-budget movie, which just barely beat R-rated "Zack and Miri Make a Porno" to avoid being Rogen's lowest ever opening.

Several films that have been in the market for awhile experienced only modest declines, thanks in large part to the Good Friday holiday. DreamWorks Animation's "Monsters vs. Aliens" fell just 31 percent on its third weekend, bringing its cumulative gross to $141 million. Nicolas Cage thriller "Knowing," from Summit Entertainment, and Paramount's buddy comedy "I Love You, Man" declined 18 percent and 17 percent, respectively, on their fourth weekends.

In limited release, metal band documentary "Anvil: The Story of Anvil" had a decent debut. The 2008 Sundance favorite, which struggled for more than a year to find a distributor, made $34,802 from three theaters.

"Hannah Montana" is Disney's second movie based on its mega-hit TV and music franchise starring Miley Cyrus. The first, 2008's "Best of Both Worlds Concert Tour," opened to $31.1 million. Though the total was lower, last year's movie actually did significantly better on a per-theater basis.

The movie, which stars Russell Crowe, Ben Affleck, Helen Mirren and Rachel McAdams, is set during these tumultuous times for the fourth estate. The backdrop for this tale of inside-the-Beltway conspiracy and intrigue is a Washington, D.C., newspaper, similar to The Washington Post, except without the benevolent Graham family as the owners, and it does capture the feeling of an industry in transition, perpetually under economic pressures from the outside, while inside a battle for supremacy reigns between the brash but unseasoned young bloggers and the traditional hard-charging gumshoe reporters.

Affleck, who plays an ambitious up-and-coming politician, and Macdonald tend to banter jocularly with talking about the seismic shifts in the media landscape, but they didn't make the film to dance on the grave of any institution. This is the kind of movie where the closing shot is a loving pan to newspapers traveling through the printing plant.

"It's the last hurrah for this analog technology. You look at it and it feels like this noble beast, the last lion in the wilderness," Macdonald says. "That's what got me interested in a film about journalism."

Over a lunch, on a windy day, at the otherwise completely deserted poolside of the Four Seasons Hotel, Affleck and Macdonald – who speak with exuberance and authority about what they see as the responsibilities and shortcomings of news-gathering organizations – resemble the dynamic between the film's main characters: Crowe's disheveled but tenacious reporter, Cal McAffrey, and Affleck's shiny bright congressman, Stephen Collins – old college pals who have grown apart while working for the public trust (albeit in different capacities) in the nation's capital.

Macdonald, who won an Oscar for his documentary "One Day in September," about the Munich Olympic massacre, before directing 2006's "The Last King of Scotland," is the rumpled one with shaggy hair and a journalist's zeal for blunt truth telling, tempered by his understanding of the Hollywood publicity machine. (He comes from a prominent filmmaking clan, both as the grandson of writer-director Emeric Pressburger, Michael Powell's collaborator on "The Red Shoes," and brother of prolific U.K. producer Andrew Macdonald.)

Looking trim in a peacoat, Affleck gives off an air of radiant health and tends to undercut his director's more earnest musings with good-natured jokes.

The film, based on the gripping 2003 six-hour British miniseries of the same name, begins with what seem to be unrelated events. A street kid is gunned down in an alley. A beautiful, young woman working on the Hill dies in a subway accident. While investigating the shooting for his newspaper, Crowe's journalist uncovers connections between the deaths – and what may be a larger government conspiracy involving a private, Halliburton-like military contractor – that could derail the career of his old buddy the congressman.

Making matters even more complicated, Crowe's character has had an affair with the congressman's wife, played by Robin Wright Penn. In a departure – and updating from the miniseries – McAdams plays a newbie blogger, more accustomed to pontificating than reporting, who finds herself paired with Crowe, who has major conflict-of-interest issues as the investigation delves deeper into his friend's past. Mirren plays the paper's acerbic top editor, caught between the financial demands of the paper and her desire to break big news and speak truth to power.

Crowe wasn't the original choice to play McAffrey. Brad Pitt initially was cast as the conflicted but dogged newsman and even made a dashing research visit to the Washington Post.

"It was the biggest thing that ever happened there," Macdonald says wryly.

"The biggest thing that happened at The Washington Post was that Brad Pitt went through?" Affleck asks. "Wow."

Macdonald is circumspect about what happened to Pitt, who dropped out a week before shooting was to commence in November 2007, which in turn led to Edward Norton, who was supposed to play the congressman, also leaving the project. Pitt was unhappy with the script and wanted to push until after the writers strike to allow for more rewrites. Universal threatened to sue the superstar for violating a pay-or-play deal, unless an appropriate replacement could be found.

"Basically, Brad and I sort of realized we were trying to make different films," says Macdonald, although along the way, a team of top screenwriters came in to work on the script, including Matthew Michael Carnahan ("The Kingdom"), Tony Gilroy ("Michael Clayton"), Billy Ray ("Breach"), as well as Macdonald's close friend, Peter Morgan ("The Queen"), who did unaccredited rewrites.

The character of McAffrey "has to be somewhat inadequate-seeming," he adds. "He has to admire and look up to his friend and feel his friend has achieved what he hasn't. Imagining Brad Pitt in that role was very hard. That's why it didn't work out, why we couldn't quite make it fit. It wasn't organic. So when Russell came in, he could fit that."

Indeed, a portly Crowe appears in the film – a character choice that might be spot-on for depicting a slovenly journalist but not always the way movie fans like to see a leading man.

Asked about his star's unexpected girth, Macdonald says diplomatically: "It fits the part. The idea is that the character is somebody who's gone to seed. The choices (Russell) made, they fit with that. It wasn't exactly what myself and the studio imagined. In that case, it worked. One of the good things about Russell, he's an actor with no vanity."

But he's also an actor who takes great pride in what he puts up on screen, and, according to Macdonald, working with him isn't always the easiest experience.

"Russell is highly opinionated," the director says. "He is very smart, and he has his own ideas a lot of the time about how his character should be. Sometimes that would be great." He gives the example of Crowe deciding his character should always wear a pink breast cancer armband, in honor of his mother who died young of the disease and left him unable to connect emotionally, a character detail that is never mentioned in the movie.

"Things like that cumulatively have the impact," Macdonald says. "It's collaboration with Russell. He's not the kind of actor when you can say, 'Do it again, but turn your head 3 degrees to the left,' like you're a photographer. He has ideas about how he's going to do it, and it's hard sometimes to get him off that. He can be tough."

When Norton left, Affleck came in to play the politician and did his share of hands-on research, visiting the offices of Congressmen Patrick Murphy, D-Pa., Adam Smith, D-Wash., and Illinois Democrat Rahm Emmanuel, now President Barack Obama's chief of staff (and brother of Hollywood talent agent Ari Emmanuel, whose Endeavor represents Affleck). This said, Affleck carefully points out that his troubled politician isn't based on any one figure.

Although Affleck and Macdonald evince a kind of romantic fondness for the noble calling of ink-stained wretches, they come across little less impressed with the lives of elected officials. Everything was a bit smaller than he expected, says Affleck, including the offices. "You have this idea, here are the halls of power and you're going to walk in and there's going to be, like, trumpets, or horns are going to blow. None of them rival the offices of the great American CEOs with $2,000 trash cans."

Affleck admits he was wary about playing a politician on screen because of his history for being politically outspoken.

"There is some baggage I carry," he says. "Playing a political character, I was afraid there would be some carry-over. People wouldn't be able to see the character."

Although he once mused about going into politics, that infatuation apparently has passed – for now. "It's something that seems much less appealing to me now the more I'm exposed to it," Affleck says.

"That's a clear political denial. Next month expect his name on the ballot box for governor of California," Macdonald jokes.

"Even going around with all these congressman, it truly is full-time fundraising, with a little bit of politics thrown in. A lot of it is ugly, tawdry work. Maybe I'm not selfless enough," Affleck says. "I also like my life. I like it more than I ever have. I loved doing this movie. I don't have any desire to step outside of that at any time."

Of course, smart adult dramas, particularly ones like "State of Play," which cost a reported $60 million to make, are themselves an endangered species within the studio system; perhaps they're not quite on the gurney with print journalism, but as Affleck says: "Usually, if you're doing a movie like this, you're in a much smaller trailer."

Even Affleck, who saw the worst of tabloid journalism during his days dating Jennifer Lopez, sees the value of traditional news gathering organizations devoted to public service. "It's the horse and buggy thing," he says. "Newspapers are the horse and buggy, and they're now making cars. But I think the bigger danger is letting go of the horses and buggy entirely while not making sure we keep from them the things that were valuable to this culture – the history of excellence in journalism."

"We're making the movie sound like it's deadly serious," Macdonald offers."It's a thriller with some comedy. The best movies are fun and make you think. Smart entertainment is the thing there's a shortage of."

Fox's "Dragonball: Evolution," which targeted young boys who wouldn't be caught dead at a "Hannah Montana" showing, didn't fare nearly as well. After receiving withering reviews and online disdain from fans of the Japanese anime series on which the movie was based, it opened to a weak $4.7 million.

Fox co-financed the film with Dune Entertainment and Ingenious Partners, liming its exposure on the approximately $25 million budget. "Dragonball" has performed better overseas, especially in Japan and China.

The weekend's third new film, "Observe and Report," also didn't make any waves. The dark comedy starring Seth Rogen opened to $11.1 million, on the low end of what was expected. Warner Bros. and Legendary Pictures co-financed the $18 million-budget movie, which just barely beat R-rated "Zack and Miri Make a Porno" to avoid being Rogen's lowest ever opening.

Several films that have been in the market for awhile experienced only modest declines, thanks in large part to the Good Friday holiday. DreamWorks Animation's "Monsters vs. Aliens" fell just 31 percent on its third weekend, bringing its cumulative gross to $141 million. Nicolas Cage thriller "Knowing," from Summit Entertainment, and Paramount's buddy comedy "I Love You, Man" declined 18 percent and 17 percent, respectively, on their fourth weekends.

In limited release, metal band documentary "Anvil: The Story of Anvil" had a decent debut. The 2008 Sundance favorite, which struggled for more than a year to find a distributor, made $34,802 from three theaters.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"Often it does seem a pity that Noah and his party did not miss the boat."

- Mark Twain (1835 - 1910)

Balance is the key. Balance is the key to many things. Do we understand balance? The word "balance" has seven letters. Seven is difficult to balance, but not impossible if we are able to divide. There are, of course, the pros and cons of division.

Looking for a team effort

Game. UMass has become a big game for other teams, as well.

Saturday's Senior Day matchup at Garber Field with the Hoyas (5-6, 1-3 ECAC) begins a crucial end-of-the-year stretch for the Minutemen – who have three conference games and its annual clash with Syracuse (No. 3 in the nation) on April 25 still on the schedule.

With the way goalkeeper Doc Schneider and the rest of UMass has played against tough competition this season, the Minutemen seem ready for the difficult stretch ahead.

"There's a different level of preparation, for sure. And a different level of sense of urgency this season," Cannella said. "Particularly the seniors – guys like Doc, Joe Reale, Evan Blum, Rory [Pedrick], Jimmy [Connolly], Tim [Balise], Brennan Mack and Dennis Lynch. All the seniors and I think the rest of the team is aware of that and those guys have done a good job of leading this group this year."

It's a group that is undefeated in the ECAC, featuring a dynamic duo at attack with Connolly (26 goals) and Balise (21) and one of the premier goalkeepers in the country with Schneider – who is backed up on defense by All-American candidate Diogo Godoi and Brennan Mack.

UMass' senior class has had a lot of success. And they had it early, reaching the NCAA title game in 2006. But that success hasn't translated against Georgetown, which has won three straight and four of the last five meetings.

"They've beaten the heck out of us over the last three years. It hasn't been much of a rivalry," Cannella said. "We play a similar style to them. It's sort of a natural rivalry because of that.

"We've only played nine games, they've won six. So I don't know if it's a huge rivalry or not. But within the conference, this game has meant a lot for sure," he added.

If UMass can snap the losing streak to the Hoyas, the Minutemen would need just one win in its final two conference games (at Fairfield on April 21; at Rutgers on May 2) to clinch the ECAC Championship and the automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament.

To do it, UMass will have to do its best to contain the high-powered Hoyas offense, led by Andrew Brancaccio and Ricky Mirabito who have each scored 19 goals. With Scott Kocis (12 goals) and Craig Dowd (17 assists, 9 goals) also making plays, there's a lot for Schneider to prepare for.

Looking at last year's game film would be a good start. Georgetown launched an amazing 61 shots in the 12-8 victory. Even a then-career high 20 saves from Schneider wasn't enough in the losing effort.

Schneider, who currently leads the nation in save percentage (65.3), always seems to step up against the best teams. But he's going to need the ECAC's highest-scoring offense (10.3 goals per game) to continue its strong play.

Connolly and Balise will need a little help from some of the younger players on the team, including Art Kell (9 goals) and Ryan Marcus (7).

"They always are [the key]," Cannella said of the production from the underclassmen. "We've been imploring those guys that we need them and need them to be better. Whenever those guys get in there we need them to be better and help our seniors for sure."

If Connolly and Balise can get that help, UMass has its best chance to end its struggles against Georgetown and be one stop closer to locking up its first ECAC title since 2005.

NOTES

Georgetown and UMass have won seven of the last eight ECAC Championships. Loyola, which took the title last season, is the only other team to win one since 2000.

Balise and Connolly combine for spark

4-0 in ECAC play and in conference games Schneider has a .738 save percentage and a 5.23 GAA in his career. Schneider has made 674 saves, second in UMass all-time save history.

Balise and Connolly have led UMass' offense all season. The duo has scored 47 of the Minutemen's 103 goals this season. Connolly leads the team with 30 points (26 goals, four assists) followed by Balise with 26 points (21 goals, five assists).

Balise has shown his ability on attack this season. He has 10 goals in the last three games – a hat trick in each. He has scored a goal in the last eight games and has earned a point in UMass' last 17 games, dating back to last season.

At the start of the season Cannella didn't know what to expect with this group compared with leaders from past years. He added that he typically doesn't make these comparisons until the season finishes.

"There's a different level of preparation, for sure. And a different level of sense of urgency, particularly the seniors – guys like Doc, Joe Reale, Evan Blum, Rory and Jimmy, Tim, Brennan Mack, Dennis Lynch. All the seniors and I think the rest of the team is aware of that and those guys have done a good job of leading this group this year," he said.

Saturday will be the last time UMass (7-3, 4-0 ECAC) plays Georgetown (5-6, 1-3 ECAC) in an ECAC game. Currently the senior class is 0-3 against the Hoyas.

"I think for the seniors they want that. They want to win the last game they get to play against Georgetown – particularly their last game on Garber Field. I'm not sure that's the focus that you want," Cannella added.

Balschmiter pitches another gem, offense hits for fences

her 110th career victory at UMass. The walk to Lotito was the only of the night for Balschmiter as she pitched seven scoreless innings, giving up just three hits and striking out 11.

"I had been struggling on the mound a little bit and wasn't up to my standards. So to come out yesterday and get the no-hitter and come out today and shut a good hitting team down I felt great," Balschmiter said.

BU's Megan Currier got the loss for her three innings pitched. She gave up four hits, one being the home run by Reeves, the only run she gave up. Kelley Engman relieved Currier in the fourth and gave up three more hits and the final two runs.

The only threat Balschmiter faced came in the fourth with UMass leading 1-0. After getting Emily Roesch to ground out to second basemen Kyllie Magill, the Terriers hit two consecutive singles. BU's leftfielder, Rachel Moeller, worked Balschmiter to a full count before hitting a fly ball into foul territory along the right-field line. UMass' right fielder Davina Hernandez caught the ball for the second out and fired the ball into the infield. The Terriers' Nora Militz found herself caught in a rundown after she tried to tag up and advance to third, and eventually was tagged out to end the Terriers rally.

"They made a base running mistake and we took it to roll them up in the inning," Sortino said following the game. "That was a big inning for them because they had two back-to-back hits, they had a well hit ball to the right side and I thought that was a pretty good way to shut them down because they definitely were threatening."

The Minutewomen added two more runs later in the game, both leadoff homeruns in the fifth and sixth inning. Audrey Boutin led off the fifth inning as a pinch hitter for Hernandez and hit her first career home run. Samantha Salato followed in the sixth inning with another leadoff home run, her 10th homerun of the season and third in the last two games.

The Minutewomen may have had the long ball working for them, but they did struggle putting together multiple hits, and when they did, they squandered the opportunity. In the first inning, Carly Normandin led off with a double but was later thrown out at home after a slight hesitation rounding third base on a Magill single.

Normandin again got a hit in the fifth inning after Boutin's home run but was thrown out at first after Magill popped up a bunt attempt and was caught too far off first base.

Cannella, team ready for every opponent

By Eli Rosenswaike
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Don't call Greg Cannella crazy.

Because no matter how disappointing Georgetown has been this season – especially by its high-standards – the Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach refuses to let his team overlook the talented, yet scuffling Hoyas.

"You can't overlook Georgetown ever," Greg Canella said before practice Wednesday. "I think Georgetown brings obviously a bunch of NCAA Tournaments, a Final Four [in 1999] and a stature that if you overlook them, you're nuts."

Considering the recent dominance by Georgetown over UMass and the Eastern College Athletic Conference over the last five years, the 15-year coach of the Minutemen knows better.

"They are an excellent program, well-coached and very aggressive. They play lacrosse like it should be played," Cannella said. "Their style allows their athletes to play, gives them an opportunity to showcase their talents."

After a preseason ranking in the Top 8 in both the media and coaches poll, Georgetown lost four of its first six games to start the season to fall well outside of the Top 20. But the Hoyas are lurking now – one spot out of the poll – after recent wins over No. 17 Harvard, Mount St. Mary's and Fairfield.

When asked what's enabled Georgetown to have a quick turnaround this season, Cannella had a simple answer.

"They're good," he said bluntly.

"I think when you're Georgetown teams gun for you. It's a top game of the year for a lot of teams," he continued. "That's not an easy thing to protect against and obviously, they've been nicked a couple times this year, but they're as good as anyone we'll play for sure."

It's something that UMass (7-3, 4-0 ECAC) has also had to deal with. The Minutemen, ranked No. 12 in the media poll, look strikingly similar to the 2006 team that reached the NCAA National Championship

Saturday's game against Georgetown will be emotional for senior Jim Connolly [pictured] as well as the rest of the Minutemen. Connolly leads UMass in goals (26) and points (30). He also isn't afraid to shoot to ball, as the attackman leads UMass in shots (81).

Final game at Garber for UM senior class

By Melissa Turpin
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's hard to look past the idea of doing something for the last time.

For the No. 12 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team seniors, Saturday will be the last time they play at Garber Field in a regular season game.

Those nine seniors will be honored, but that won't be the focus of the afternoon. UMass coach Greg Cannella stressed to the seniors that their parents will go on the field and their mothers will get flowers, "hug 'em and kiss 'em" and then they will see them after the game.

"That's one of the things we need to do, to focus on the game itself," Cannella said. "It's great to recognize those guys and their folks and recognize what they've done for our program for four years, but for them, I know what's most important and that's the game."

The seniors that will be honored include Jim Balise, Jim Connolly, Dennis Lynch, Brennan Mack, Rory Pedrick, Joe Reale, Doc Schneider, redshirt senior Evan Blum and graduate student PJ Hendrick.

The senior class has become a crucial element to the Minutemen's success over the years, some of them aiding the team's run to the 2006 NCAA championship game. The seniors that are most recognized for their efforts this season are Schneider, Connolly and Balise.

Last weekend Schneider made a career-high 21 saves in UMass' 7-6 win over Hobart. He previously made 20 saves last season in the Minutemen's 12-8 loss to Georgetown – UMass was outshot 61-28. His efforts against Hobart on April 11 earned him his fifth ECAC Defensive Player of the Week honor – he has earned the weekly honor for four of the past five weeks.

Schneider is ranked No. 1 nationally for his .653 save percentage and third for his goals-against average (6.89), while leading the ECAC in both categories. The Minutemen are

There are few occasions where a coach would be happy if an umpire ignored their timeout request.

One of those occasions is when their hitter hits a homerun instead of the timeout being called, just as the Sarah Reeves of the Massachusetts softball team did in UMass' 3-0 win over Boston University on Wednesday.

"I wasn't in the coaching box yet and the umpire didn't seem to care. I called time and he didn't give it to me and [Reeves] hit a home run," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "It was the first time I've seen somebody score from standing behind them in my life time."

| BU | 0 |

With the game knotted at zero and the bottom half of the second inning starting, Reeves stepped into the left-side batters box. As the Terriers (27-13, 7-3 America East) pitcher, Megan Currier, began her windup, Sortino tried to call timeout to make her way to the third base coach box.

"I looked in the dugout and I saw her still standing there, so I figured she was going to just stand there for the first pitch and then go out to third base," Reeves said after the game. "By the time I got into the batters box I saw her go behind us and then she called timeout, but I saw the pitch was right there so I just swung and thank gosh the umpire ruled it a home run."

Reeves took the pitch to right-center field for her seventh home run of the season, giving the No. 17 Minutewomen (25-6, 8-0 Atlantic 10) a 1-0 lead, which would be more than enough for pitcher Brandice Balschmiter. Balschmiter – coming off of a no-hitter on Tuesday over Providence – continued her dominance on the mound against BU.

After walking Terrier Shayne Lotito, the first batter of the game, Balschmiter quickly retired the next three batters, two of whom struck out. It wasn't until the fourth inning before BU managed a hit off the Minutewomen's ace, on her way to

Minutewomen have chances at A–10 title

Opportunities at Garber and St. Bonaventure this weekend

By Scott Feldman
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This is sure to be one memorable weekend for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team.

First of all, it will have a Senior Day celebration. Afterwards, it will have two chances to clinch an Atlantic 10 title.

UMass will attempt to clinch the regular season A-10 Championship this weekend with a win in one of its next two games. The first game is Friday at McGuirk Stadium when the team takes on Duquesne. The Minutewomen will have a pregame ceremony honoring the contributions of their three seniors: Meghan Reddy, Holly Drown and Jackie Rosenzweig.

UMass will then travel to Olean, N.Y. to face St. Bonaventure in its final regular season game on Sunday.

The Minutewomen (8-6, 5-0 A-10) have been on roll recently since a 22-5 loss to No. 1 Northwestern on March 25, the team's last non-conference game. Since that loss, UMass has won all five of its conference games, including wins over preseason favorite Richmond and 2008 defending A-10 champion Temple.

"I think we are just really coming together as a team right now," Drown said. "We spent our whole season just waiting for the conference [games] and our game is just coming together on all aspects [on] defense, offense, and the midfield."

The Minutewomen have made dramatic improvements since their schedule began. They have scored far more goals per game against conference foes (14.8 in conference, 10.6 overall) and allowed fewer goals (6.2, 10.4).

Still, this weekend's games could present a challenge. Duquesne boasts the league's point leader, Meghan Frederick (62 points), while SBU has the league's leading goal-scorer in Molly Hastrich (48). Both teams are tied for the lead in the A-10 in points scored per game (17.00).

UMass does have a strong defense, as it is second in the A-10 in goals-against average at 10.4 and goalkeeper Katie Florence had been outstanding in conference play with a .627 save percentage in the Minutewomen's five wins.

Those units could battle each other to a draw, but where the Minutewomen hold an advantage over both teams is with their offense paired against the opposing defense. Duquesne is sixth out of eight teams in the league in goals allowed overall (12.8), while SBU has had difficulty stopping conference foes, allowing 52 goals in four games.

The UMass offense has been especially dominant in its last two games, an 18-5 drubbing of George Washington and a 16-4 rout of Temple. UMass has become noticeably better at passing the ball and creating scoring chances since the start of the season.

The Minutewomen bring a great deal of diversity to the attack. Nearly every player has a specific skill that complements a teammate. For example, Reddy is a talented set-up passer, and sophomore Haley Smith is a great one-on-one attacker and finisher. So whenever Reddy sees Smith covered man-to-man, she can get the ball to her for a good scoring chance. That's one example of many combinations UMass can use.

"We don't really have many set plays or anything like that," Drown said. "We just know each other a lot better; we know what everyone else is doing so we are playing well together."

UMass coach Alexis Venechanos mentioned how all her players' unique skills have given the Minutewomen a dynamic and balanced attack. Drown is great off the ball, while Nina Sarcona and Danielle Pelletier have great field awareness, she said. Jackie Lyons has a great first step. UMass has four players with 20 or more goals, compared to just two last year.

This will be a big weekend for the Minutewomen, so Venechanos has kept her team focused throughout the season by drilling the old 'one game at a time' cliché into her team's mindset.

"We go in with the same attitude every game and that's why we've been able to have a consistently [successful] outcome," Venechanos said.

UM holds emergency drills

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

Thanks to funding from an $11,500 grant from the Western Massachusetts Regional Homeland Security Advisory Council, University of Massachusetts Amherst Medical Reserve Corps (MRC) and Emergency Management office conducted an emergency drill on Thursday to simulate a disaster on campus.

Over 300 community volunteers played out roles depicting what would happen if an accidental ammonia discharge from the Central Heating Plant were to occur on campus, although the drill was located both inside and outside the Mullins Center Stadium, the treatment of victims was to be imagined as having taken place in Totman Gymnasium.

The drill was held to reinforce community skills in decontamination, sheltering and readiness for mass care, including emotional support as well as physical injury treatment.

At approximately 9 a.m., volunteers began congregating inside and outside the Mullins Center to prepare for the influx of "victims" exposed to the ammonia that would be arriving via PVTA buses at 10 a.m.

Those volunteers gathered outside to greet the victims were several members of the UMass student MRC, members from the Amherst Fire Department's student force, Reserved Officers Training Corps (ROTC) students, along with UMass staff members. Those immediately greeting the victims, under the instruction of student MRC member Noelle Chiavetta, were to guide the victims to other volunteers beneath tents, where victims would strip their clothes and relinquish their belongings because they and their belongings were assumed to be contaminated. The victims were instructed to wear bathing suits.

"My MRC group worked really well to get all the victim volunteers into the decontamination unit," said Chiavetta. "We also worked well with ROTC and AFD. It was just a really exciting day because we're a new RSO, and we've been working towards this event for the last three months with many, many meetings. It's great to see it in action."

Volunteers explained that they had been instructed not to touch the contaminated victims –even though they were equipped with white DuPont Proshield Nex Gen jumpsuits and doctors' face masks to protect the volunteers from contamination.

Each victim then received a plastic package containing specially-made plastic poncho-like outfits that they had to put on upon entering the decontamination tent – a big, yellow tent divided into three sections to wash, dry and allow the victims to change into another plastic outfit complete with special sandals.

Each victim had a sign suspended around their neck displaying basic information about that victim including their age, health issues and other background important in helping the volunteer medical teams assess the priority that needs to be given to that particular victim.

"I'm in the UMass Army ROTC," said junior sociology and criminal justice major Nikki Silva. "We were to expect that it would be hectic [at the decontamination unit] because it is a disaster, but basically we were to also be evaluated to see where any bottlenecking in the process occurs in case there is an actual live mass casualty. They gave us instructions about how we had to give priority to victims in a wheelchair or pregnant women."

Before the event began, Public Information Officer Karen Dunbar-Scully explained that training was given to each of the volunteer staff and each area of emergency care. There were exercise evaluators timing the volunteers' ability to treat the victims at each unit.

Outside the Mullins Center yesterday, volunteer emergency crews practice for an array of disaster scenarios to prepare in case UMass is ever faced with such situations.

The first unit was the decontamination unit, then the triage unit in which nurses quickly evaluated the medical needs of each patient.

"Everyone has specific responsibilities," said Dunbar-Scully. "The triage training system involved the volunteers being able to quickly assess victims in case of an emergency. Anyone in a mass accident would need to be seen and the severity of the injuries assessed."

Many elements were considered in preparation for dealing with victims' individual needs. For example, one victim's card instructed her to pretend she was an elderly woman with Alzheimer's disease who was incredibly confused and had lost her granddaughter.

Also, several bilingual victims pretending to be suffering from distress also pretended they could not speak English.

One volunteer student nurse said that she had to think back to high school French to try to calm down one of the victims. And one victim kept screaming "help me!" in Spanish, but she was immediately moved to one of the several emotional support rooms headed by mental health service staff after a medical evaluation.

"All of the emotional supporters did really well," said the drill's emotional support controller, Kerry Morrison, a psychologist and coordinator of the suicide prevention grant from UMass mental health services. "I'm impressed. They all did great in terms of people skills and communicating with the victims."

During the drill, victims with the most severe injuries in need of immediate treatment were given red bracelets, while less severe injuries were given yellow bracelets. Victims who did not need immediate treatment or had minor injuries were given green bracelets.

Based on the color of his or her bracelet, the victim was instructed to follow their color's line of tape extending from the triage assessment station to the treatment unit within the Mullins Center arena.

Once given medical care, victims were sent to the sheltering unit to register after answering a series of medical health history questions. Victims in need of medication were sent to discuss needs with the pharmacy booth after registering.

After reaching the sheltering zone, victims could fill out evaluation forms about how they felt their treatment went. The sheltering zone provided victims with coffee, water bottles, granola bars and beds. Some of the beds had been brought over by Amherst College officials, who did not know the drill was to take place but managed to get the resources needed by the drill over to UMass within a half hour.

Volunteers from the University consisted of members from MRC, University Health Services, medical and mental health staff, representatives from the campus' Environmental Health and Safety, transit and police departments, student emergency medical technicians and members of the ROTC. All of the volunteer victims were students from all years within the School of Nursing. Community volunteers were from the Amherst Fire Department, American Red Cross, Hampshire Country MRC, Amherst College and the Massachusetts Department of Public Health.

"I thought it was a great opportunity to get experience for an emergency of this size," said freshman and member of the Amherst Fire Student Force Katie Eaton.

The planning was headed by UMass MRC unit coordinator Ann Becker and UMass emergency manager Brian Olsen.

"This is the third really large scale exercise that I have been a part of," said Becker. "Overall each time we've done this, [everyone] learns more about how to be prepared. The cooperation between the town and the University was unbelievable. Everyone was really incredibly engaged, on board and helpful. I believe we all learned from each other a tremendous amount. Today's event just shows why we do this, and that there is a lot of teamwork involved. I think this [drill] was the best one yet so far. I'm thrilled with how it went."

The majority of volunteers and coordinators at the event agreed that the drill was a success.

Now that the drill is over, Becker also realizes improvements do not stop at the drill itself.

"It's an on-going process. There are some assistance issues we identified between different triage sections, one of the next steps will be to coordinate with more partners within the Emergency operation center and the incident command center," said Becker. "Although I think in general we really wanted to look at these capabilities, especially in the realm of psychological first aid and emotional support, I really want us to work further on that. Everyone was fantastic today."

Talk covers diversity, 'South Park', 'Family Guy'

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

When Matt Glowacki, a speaker who was born without legs, took the stage in the Cape Cod Lounge, any sense of awkwardness that was felt toward his birth defect was immediately eliminated.

Glowacki, who was visiting the school Wednesday night as part of his lecture, "Diversity through South Park and Family Guy," introduced himself to the audience by jokingly acknowledging his lack of legs. He told the Cape Cod Lounge's audience that, "for the next hour, it's going to be all right to laugh at people with disability."

Knowing that it was the question on many of the guests' minds, Glowacki addressed his handicap by telling the audience that he was simply born without legs.

"I don't have any legs because I was born that way," he said. "No one really knows why it happens. But, it doesn't stop me from lying to children."

"Everything else is there and works just fine," Glowacki added, drawing the first of many laughs from the crowd.

After opening the evening by making the audience more comfortable about why he is in a wheelchair, Glowacki talked about his life and how he never let his handicap stop him from enjoying what he does.

"I found things I like to do and turned them into jobs," he said.

Beginning his lecture, Glowacki spoke about how it is television, rather than parents, that teaches children. According to Glowacki, in a given week, teens will spend 35 to 55 hours watching television, but only 38.5 minutes in meaningful conversation with their parents.

He followed with what many people had come for, a clip from "Family Guy," which focused on body image. Afterwards, Glowacki broke down the segment, examining the use of satire and parody to show a point. He said that, by using these methods, "South Park" and "Family Guy" make strong social commentary and carry legitimate messages.

While Glowacki would go on to show other clips and analyze them, actual discussion of the shows was less than an audience member might have suspected.

"The reason why I use the branding is to draw in as large an audience as I possibly can," Glowacki said afterwards. "So those people that come here that want to be entertained by the show, I feel that I deliver because I give them parts of the show I want to bring their attention to."

Glowacki discussed a number of other topics in diversity like race. But in the end, the lecture's strength was in Glowacki's discussion of the type of diversity that was most familiar to him – disabilities.

Glowacki defined a disability as anything that limits people from being unable to get out of cars quickly, like getting a flat tire, 13 feet of snow or a bad girlfriend.

Ableism, or what Glowacki originally called "gimpphobic," was the recurrent theme as he often referred to his past experiences.

Rather than complain about his experiences though, Glowacki focused his efforts on educating the audience as to how to talk to a disabled person and avoid offending him.

"If you come up to me and say 'wow, you can drive a car, how do you do it?' That's being ignorant. If you come up to me and say 'I understand you can drive, but how exactly does it work?' Then I'd love to talk to you."

He also addressed the issue of taking the handicapped stall or parking space, saying that, even though it may not happen to you, it will always happen to the handicapped person.

"It may be one in a hundred for you or even one in a thousand. But for me, it's 100 percent of the time."

Glowacki began his career as a DJ so that he could still go to dances and get paid for it. As his business grew, he also took up making customized wheelchairs. Because as Glowacki joked, he is quite familiar and fond of wheelchairs, he has helped make wheelchairs for Olympic athletes around the world.

An Olympic athlete himself in sit-down volleyball for the Special Olympics, Glowacki often used his past experiences to help portray life through the eyes of someone who uses a wheelchair. Having no legs, however, has not affected his happiness or his sense of humor.

"People tell me 'no, you can't love your life because you have a disability,'" Glowacki said. "I tell them, 'my disability means more to you than it does to me.' I tell people that walking is overrated."

Overall, Glowacki's presentation got a positive response from the crowd, enjoying both the humorous and educational aspects of the lecture.

"I loved it, I really did," senior and nursing major Charlotte Chery said afterwards. "It was informative but it was also entertaining. I learned a lot from it."

"I like all the 'isms' he talked about because I don't always thing of those things," senior Aouatif Ansari, a marketing major, said.

Man finds tooth in gummy snack

By Ruth Sheehan
McClatchy Newspapers

RALEIGH, N.C. — How much is a stray tooth worth? Somewhere between $35 and $35,000.

Or so hopes Shea Harris of Raleigh, who discovered what looks like a human tooth embedded in the dinosaur-shaped gummy fruit snack he was eating.

The tooth was not his own.

On the afternoon of Jan. 15, Harris, 25, purchased two boxes of Kroger-brand dinosaur fruit snacks on sale for 99 cents each. He was "killing those snacks," even though, because of his braces, he had to suck the gummies rather than chew them. By evening, he had finished one box and was into the third packet of the second — working on a T-Rex, to be precise — when he felt something hard in his mouth.

He spit out the partially dissolved orange chewy creature, with what appeared to be a human tooth still halfway embedded in the head.

"I was freaked out by it!" Harris said. "It was disgusting."

He immediately hopped into his car and headed back to the Kroger where he bought the snacks, and showed the gummy and its apparently dental cargo to the clerk. The store wasn't much help. So Harris called the toll-free number on the box.

He eventually got a call back from a customer service representative for ConAgra Foods, the massive food company that produces the snacks.

"We take consumer comments and concerns very seriously," Stephanie Childs, a spokeswoman for ConAgra, told The News & Observer.

Harris was unimpressed.

"They offered me $35 or the option of filing a claim," said Harris, who works for a law enforcement agency he declined to name. He said he found the amount insulting. "I told them I'd be filing a claim."

At first, Harris imagined he'd go through a lawyer to collect big bucks. But none of the attorneys he contacted would take the case. Though Harris worries about hidden contagion, he hasn't suffered any real harm from the admittedly disgusting discovery rattling around in his mouth.

ConAgra called in a claims management firm, which had the crunchy-chewy remains of the T-Rex picked up on Wednesday for independent testing.

Harris doesn't know what will happen next. Even if the object is not a tooth, he said, it shouldn't have been in a fruit snack. If he'd been chewing, he could have broken a tooth.

So Harris has submitted his own claim, along with a letter seeking an apology and $35,000.

"I know that might sound outrageous," Harris said. "But I know this is worth more than $35."

He's willing to negotiate. As for fruit snacks? For what it's worth, he'll never eat one again.

YouTube's impact on election discussed

Conference held at UMass campus

By Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano
Collegian Staff

Since its creation in February 2005, YouTube has evolved into a major player in the media community and the 2008 Presidential Election provided a gauge of just how influential the video-hosting website has become.

Many think it has revolutionized the news cycle by circumventing traditional mainstream media.

Starting Thursday and continuing today in the Campus Center, the UMass political science department is taking a major step in exploring YouTube's effects as it hosts a two-day conference designed to formulate new ways to analyze user generated content and the effects it had on the 2008 election.

Respected academics from across the globe will flock to the Campus Center's 10th floor to share their views on the topic.

"A conference like this is designed to create a new research community around a specific topic," said Stuart Shulman, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts and the architect of the conference. "I had been noticing that there was increasing use of YouTube by candidates and there were some interesting things going on. It made me think that if there are so many people saying that YouTube matters, you ought to do some research to find out if it actually matters."

Shulman worked with the Political Science Department to organize the event. He also expressed desire to collaborate with computer scientists on the technical aspect of the "YouTube effect," as he calls it.

"We're really interested in working with computer scientists to help us gather this data, organize it, archive it and build tools to study it," he said. "That's really the inspiration for the conference."

One thing that became apparent during the 2008 election was the shift of political advertisements from the TV to the Internet.

Popular promotional videos like "Yes We Can" were seen by millions of people all over the world and helped the Obama campaign spread its message to parts of the world that would otherwise have been left in the dark.

Noshir Contractor will be one of two keynote speakers at the conference.

Shulman became interested in an idea called the "digital footprint," which entails that videos building up a substantial number of views somehow find their way into the public consciousness and can have a "viral" effect on public opinion.

The international impact of YouTube will be on full display at the conference.

The first of two keynote speakers is Richard Rogers, a Web epistemologist from the University of Amsterdam.

The second keynote speaker is Noshir Contractor, a communications professor at Northwestern University who specializes in the study of social networks.

Professor Contractor is optimistic about the methods in place to analyze YouTube's effect on the past election, citing the "digital footprint" idea as the organizing principle.

"The very act of engaging in this collective consumer-generated content is in and of itself providing you with the data on how to study its effects", said Contractor. "That's a profound change from anything we've had in the past."

In addition to the two keynote speakers, 24 professors from across the country have been invited to give three to five minute presentations and submit research papers on the topic. The creator of the best presentation will be awarded a $1,000 cash prize.

As Professor Shulman pointed out, it remains to be seen whether or not YouTube-generated content had an effect on the outcome of the 2008 election.

However, few deny that it is a vastly expanding medium that ought to somehow be studied.

The conference hopes to answer exactly how the effects of YouTube can be studied, and whether its reach will continue to expand and provide a media alternative or if it will simply find a place amongst other news media.

Students visit DR on alternative spring break

By Hannah McGoldrick

Over spring break a group of University of Massachusetts students went on a 10-day service-learning trip to the Dominican Republic as part of a community service learning class offered by the Center for Latin American Caribbean and Latino Studies (CLACLS). In previous years, program director Gloria Bernabé-Ramos took the class to the Dominican Republic and Argentina to learn about the culture and politics to experience cultural exchange. However, this year was the first year Bernabé-Ramos included the community service aspect to the course.

CLACLS partnered with the Community Service Alliance (CSA), a grassroots organization based out of Santo Domingo, whose mission is to "channel human and financial resources brought by volunteers and students to communities and organizations in the Dominican, not only helping to respond directly to local needs, but also to facilitate life changing experience for participants."

According to Mario Teran, a graduate student studying regional planning who took the course, "The CSA was very helpful and accommodating."

In the CLACLS course, students focused on rebuilding a school in Hato Mayor, a town two hours east of Santo Domingo, for children whose birth certificates and papers were swept away by Hurricane George, leaving them undocumented and unable to enroll in other local schools.

This construction included setting up the water system, installing fences around the school for security, building an additional bathroom, setting up a garden/play area in the patio, installing windows and doors and decorating the classrooms.

"Many of the students in the course had never been to communities such as Hato Mayor and their shared experiences helped them to engage in the cultural exchange," Bernabé-Ramos said.

One of the goals of the course was to further understand the dynamics that shape a culture and country in the developing world.

Many of the students felt that the trip not only impacted the community but impacted them as well.

"The children in the community touched [my] heart," Teran said.

At the conclusion of the trip the students were asked to develop topics of research.

Junior Jasmin Torrejon, a sociology major, said she was doing her project on the impact of globalization on the Dominican Republic.

Torrejon said she noticed "many American hotels and Nestle milk in Santo Domingo."

This, she said, showed the effects of globalization and development that has occured in a developing country, such as the Dominican Republic.

She also noted the deflating Dominican peso.

"One American dollar is the equivalent to 35 Dominican pesos," she said.

Others, such as Teran and Elizabeth Rockett, an education and Hispanic literature and linguistics double major, focused on the lack of education in the Dominican Republic.

Since most of the week was spent with school-age children, Rockett said she could see the "poor conditions and the lack of education" in the town of Hato Mayor.

Many, but not all, students enrolled in the course are CLACLS students.

Teran said the course "was a way to retouch with [his] Dominican roots."

Torrejon, who grew up in a heavily populated Dominican community, said the course, "helped [her] to connect with them on a deeper level."

Heather McCormack, a junior communications major, said the experience was more than just a class she was interested in.

When talking about building the school in Hato Mayor she said, "I know that these women can do this whole project themselves. Indeed, that is what makes them so empowered – not simply 'deficient' people 'in need of services,' but independent, remarkably self-sustaining individuals in community with one another."

McCormack talked about her worries and uncertainties as to how the locals viewed them. However, it became clearer to her as the week went on.

"Not only do they love us, but in our daily interactions with them, I noticed the lines between the 'us' and 'them' began to blur," she said.

McCormack said she found herself very comfortable with them recollecting one neighborhood girl who said, "'Quiere jugar?' ... and I think I am home."

The students in the class discovered firsthand the contrasting characteristics of the Dominican system of education as compared to that of the United States.

"It made me conscious of the educational system in the U.S., which comparatively is blessed with an abundance of resources, depending on where you live, but has become so standardized it seems to squash that natural curious impulse for learning, for innovation," said McCormack. "These kids had the impulse, but had little to no resources for which to evolve that impulse into reality."

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF." – SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

It may look like an eggroll, but it's a Twinkie

Rachel Dougherty

"Why are you white?" I bit back a grimace and tried to smile at the customer. I'd been waitressing at the Wong Garden Chinese Restaurant in Belchertown for two months, and it still astounded me how many people asked me that question.

"Well," I answered, "seeing as we live in a small, rural, predominantly white town in western Massachusetts, it would be hard for the owners to keep the restaurant fully staffed if they only hired Asian employees. Also, it would be illegal." The guy looked at me suspiciously for a minute.

"But you work at a Chinese place. And you're white."

"I'm albino, ok? What can I get for you?"

Aside from the people who come in looking for dog or asking whether the pet goldfish in the tank at the back of the room are on the menu, "why are you white?" or "you don't look Asian," are the biggest eye-rollers that come out of working at a Chinese restaurant.

As annoying as the question is, maybe these customers have a point. Chinese restaurant, right? Chinese food. White Anglo-Saxon waitress? One of these things is not like the other.

People walk into a Chinese restaurant with the expectation that food – and the service – will be somewhat authentic. But how authentic is American Chinese food?

Not very. In fact, most of the dishes we call "Chinese" are no more Asian than I am.

According to New York Times columnist Jennifer 8. Lee, Chinese food has become "more American than apple pie." Lee, author of "Fortune Cookie Chronicles," points out that while most Americans probably can't remember the last time they ate apple pie, the majority of them could name a time in the last month that they had ordered Chinese food.

There are approximately 40,000 Chinese restaurants in the United States, more than McDonald's, KFCs, Burger Kings and Wendy's combined.

Most of what we call Chinese food in America really isn't Chinese at all. Fortune cookies originated in Japan, and barely resemble the greenish-grey miso paste cookies they were developed from. Broccoli, used in dishes like beef with broccoli and General Tso Chicken, is an Italian vegetable. Chop suey, for all its popularity in the U.S., is virtually unknown in China, translating to "odds and ends" in Chinese. Asking for a good place to get chop suey in China is like asking Americans for a good place to get "leftovers."

Chinese food is so American, Chinese people won't eat it. At least, most first generation and international students won't. My friend Sherry Mengyang Sun, a sophomore international student from northern China, struggled her first year in the United States with food she described as "so unhealthy, fattening."

> Most of what we call Chinese food in America really isn't Chinese at all.

"Different regions in China all have slightly different styles of food. My hometown, Sichuan, usually has white rice, and about three dishes, and a soup. The soup is much more 'dilute' than the American definition, and tastes healthier," Mengyang Sun said. "American Chinese food seems to be most similar to Cantonese food, at least, the food flavor in the south of China."

She adds, "Fast food in China would be like a pan of fried rice, or noodle soup with meat and vegetables. So you see, that's not much 'deep fried.'"

Even the food at Wong Garden – which, in my completely biased opinion, is the best Chinese food in the valley – caters to the American preference for sweet, deep-fried and fattening foods. While it is possible to get more authentic dishes at the restaurant, the majority of customers come for the egg rolls, crab rangoons and beef teriyaki. The food that restaurants make for themselves is very different from what they make for the customers, consisting mostly of white rice, vegetables, leafy soups and less fatty meats – all things that aren't such a hit with American customers.

"No one would buy it," my boss would say. "I'd sell it, but no one would buy it. So we take it off the menu."

He's right: except for a daring few, most American customers probably wouldn't order things like bitter melon, lotus root, bok choy (a kind of white cabbage) or, as we had occasionally at the restaurant, pig's feet. The first time my boss tricked me into trying bitter melon, I spat it out. He thought it was hilarious. White girl can't hold her bitter Asiatic vegetables.

So if the benchmark of American cuisine is a heaping pile of lo mein, what's so strange about hiring an American to serve it? Is it even possible to get "real" Chinese food in the United States? Yes. According to Sherry Sun, you just have to know where to look.

"It's easy to get authentic Chinese food in the huge cities in the U.S. New York City has the best Chinese food," Sherry said. "People who cook in a lot of the restaurants there are first generation immigrants. They kind of don't bother to integrate within American culture."

Although the ingredients for authentic Chinese dishes are more easily found in Chinatown supermarkets in New York and Boston, it is possible to get them at local stores as well. Asian International, a market on Russell Street in Hadley, imports a lot of the traditional foods. Even American supermarkets like Stop & Shop and Big Y have some authentic Asian foods available, though in less quantity and variety.

As for the $2 appetizers coming to you on a stick at strip malls everywhere? Careful. It may look like an eggroll, but it's a Twinkie.

Contempt for on-campus corruption

Matthew Robare

I have come to the conclusion that one useless academic is called a radical, that two are called an economics department and that three or more become an administration. And by God I have had this administration. For 10 years, according to a Daily Collegian article last week – 10 years – the University administration has had a contract with Automatic Laundry Systems.

Ten years of student complaints, of malfunctioning laundry machines and $1.25 or more laundry loads that never get clean or dry. What in the hell is the administration waiting for?

Laundry is not one of those things that will bring students out marching in front of Whitmore, but perhaps it should be. It seems that the only way to get the administration to listen to anything is to protest until we are blue in the face and sore in the foot. Whether they will hear or even consider what we say is another matter entirely. Even then, we must contend with the Republican Club gleefully supporting the administration in every move it makes on a matter of principle and running counter protests.

I submit to you, students of the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, that the administration is corrupt. From the Sovietesque suppression of the Free State of Butterfield to constant fee increases and unnecessary trips to learn about software, the people in Whitmore must laugh every time they go through the Student Union and see the "Students First" logo.

Someone, somewhere, is making money off the shoddy construction, the expensive trips and this laundry contract. Did it never occur to them to take student complaints seriously and get out of the contract before 10 years were up? Did it ever occur to any honest people just why they were signing a 10 year contract at all?

> The Follett people should be run off campus by a crowd of pitchfork-and-torch-wielding people from the Radical Student Union yelling about exploitation and price gouging.

Or is this university so corrupt as to render Peter completely unaware that he is being robbed to pay Paul?

Follett has an exclusive contract with the university to rip students off, as does Coke. Apparently, so does Automatic Laundry Systems. RSOs must only use one (very expensive) printer for making T-shirts. Likewise, they must use the University for catering events held on campus. The administration is so corrupt and afraid of its embezzlement sources being cut they will not even allow students to compete with it on campus. Or was there another reason we can't use YCMP swipes at the People's Market? The attitude shown by the administration in the matter of contracts defies common sense and sound economics.

All the exclusive contracts must end. House Councils and Area Governments ought to be free to be able to decide what laundry service they want and which drink and snack vendors to allow.

The Follett people should be run off campus by a crowd of pitchfork-and-torch-wielding people from the Radical Student Union yelling about exploitation and price gouging. Student Valley Productions should be able to make enough money selling Comedy Jam T-shirts to send Mission: Improvable to Chicago. And People's Market should be able to accept YCMP swipes, because, quite frankly, I've never been there and I never have any cash.

If there is one thing, I cannot stand, it is being ripped off. Regardless of the source – corruption or incompetence – it makes me mad. Either way it must be investigated and put to an end. I am tired of paying an arm and a leg for textbooks at the annex and getting a load of arm hair when I sell them back at the end of the year.

I am tired of wearing wet pajamas to bed and wet clothing to class. What makes it all the more infuriating is that I cannot be the first person to be angry at this clear disregard for the welfare of the students –and yet nothing has ever changed. Will the only way to be taken seriously be a riot such as at the New School in New York City, where protesters occupied a school building and were forced out violently by the New York police? God, I hope not.

There are serious questions about the business practices and financial acumen of the University's administration and, in the interests of transparency, they need to be answered. It may take good reporting skills, or a Freedom of Information Act request, or a whistle blower or perhaps a formal audit on the part of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts – but one way or another, they will be answered.

"Bail out" for Pakistan

Ebad Rahman & Awais Kasi

Iraq is now on the backburner. Holding true to his promises, President Barack Obama is swiftly withdrawing troops in Iraq and fortifying the U.S. military presence in Afghanistan. This past February, Obama ordered 17,000 troops be sent to Afghanistan to support the existing 36,000 troops to stabilize the country. With our reenergized focus on Afghanistan, U.S. policymakers are scurrying to reevaluate their strategy in the country, and how they provide aid to their greatest strategic ally in the region – Pakistan.

Our policy toward Pakistan has always undermined its democratic initiatives and values. This time the U.S. needs to do things right and provide more holistic support to the country to serve our interests and the interests of the Pakistani people. It needs to provide a continuous stream of aid and focus on the issue of Kashmir.

Throughout Pakistan's history, the U.S. has provided spotty aid, helping them when we needed them and neglecting them when they needed us.

We provided aid to former military dictator Ayub Khan, after he seized power in 1958, to build a stronghold against communism. When Russian clashed with Afghanistan in the 80s, we provided support to another dictator, Muhammad Zia-ul-Haq, who seized power in 1977. More recently we helped former president Pervez Musharraf, who seized power in 1999, to fight the Taliban and find Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan.

During periods of civilian rule, U.S. aid halted. This has constantly pushed Pakistan toward a police state and deteriorated democratic values.

The Pakistan Enduring Assistance and Cooperation Enhancement Act, or PEACE Act, a new policy introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives, outlines how aid will be given to Pakistan.

The policy also puts other unviable conditions that Pakistan is not willing to compromise on. One is access to nuclear proliferators, specifically Abdul Qadir Khan. Khan is seen as a hero in Pakistan for developing nuclear weapons for Pakistan to counter Indian nuclear weapons development. Sacrificing him would be political suicide.

This bill also fails to recognize Pakistan's priority on India. A condition would prevent Pakistan from providing aid to those who oppose India. This would force Pakistan to focus on Afghanistan at the expense of Kashmir, which it is not willing to do.

Yesterday, Ayesha Jalal, a scholar Pakistani history, spoke at Smith College. One of her more controversial viewpoints surrounds the split that formed India and Pakistan. The split left unresolved ownership of the territory of Kashmir, which remains the focus of Indians and Pakistanis today.

In an MSNBC interview, Obama said, "We should probably try to facilitate a better understanding between Pakistan and India and try to resolve the Kashmir crisis so that they can stay focused not on India, but on the situation with those militants [in Afghanistan]."

India and Pakistan are in a battle to gain as much influence in region as possible amid the chaos. The fight for influence now resides in Afghanistan. If the problem in Kashmir is resolved like promised, then Pakistan can authentically help with missions in Afghanistan, instead of using it to strengthen its leverage over India.

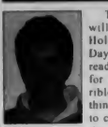
> If the problem in Kashmir is resolved like promised, then Pakistan can authentically help with missions in Afghanistan, instead of using it to strengthen its leverage over India.

This has also showed the people that we are unreliable allies with unreliable support, and it has created a sense of betrayal among Pakistanis. New policy toward Pakistan needs to provide continuous aid to Pakistan to show our resolve in being allies with the country and to develop their democratic ideals.

Obama administration officials who are currently working on a rebooted policy towards Pakistan must provide a multifaceted aid package for Pakistan that covers not just military aid, but a "bailout" of sorts. It could help the country with much needed infrastructure, fixing its shoddy educational system, strengthen its reeling economy and overhaul the ever-present electricity crisis.

Pakistan Ambassador to the U.S. Husain Haqqani, at a Washington think tank – the Atlantic Council – is reported to have said, "A company at the verge of failure is quite clearly able to get a bigger bailout than a nation that has been accused of failure."

"Pakistan and neighboring Afghanistan … deserve more than [the money given to] some failed insurance company or some car company whose achievement is that they couldn't make cars that they could sell," Haqqani said.



Dawn, a daily newspaper that circulates in Pakistan, reported that new policy is increasing Indian contact in Afghanistan. The new policy is showing a trend toward getting India more involved in Afghanistan. This situation will further inflame the influence war in Afghanistan.

To the U.S., it will help with the situation in Afghanistan, but Pakistan sees it as another betrayal by the U.S. Instead of focusing on Kashmir, the U.S. is doing the opposite by involving India. With a stronger Indian presence, Pakistan would find itself in a compromised security situation when the U.S. leaves, which it will have to do eventually.

U.S. policy in Afghanistan fails to take into consideration Pakistan's perspectives on security and long-term well being. If the U.S. provided continuous support from earlier alliances and helped in resolving the Kashmir issue, the U.S. would have found a stronger and more supportive ally in the region. These issues still aggravate the region and are necessary to address to placate the region now and the future.

Never say "never again"

Eli Gottlieb

This coming Tuesday will be Yom ha'Shoah, Holocaust Remembrance Day. For that fact, I will read a Mourner's Kaddish for the victims of that terrible event. However, I think that we really need to change how we observe the so-called holiday. Typical observance comes through planting flags on campus lawns to represent the number killed and various organizations representing Jews, gays, cripples, and the various other minority groups murdered en masse by Hitler making statements about the absolute horror of it all, and of course – recital of the mantra "never again."

Never do we observe Yom ha'Shoah by making any attempt to actually get over what happened, and I think therein lies our error. Think, after all, of the neuroses Holocaust remembrance has spawned: the vilification of Adolf Hitler, the absolute censorship of all violent material in Germany, endless historical revisionism about the Holocaust itself, the politicization of morality and the retardation of the Jewish people's development so far that we've begun losing any sense of identity.

> They needed a scapegoat and Hitler gave them one, with the kind of methodical madness that only a brilliant mind drunk on power, hatred, convenient lies and complete irreverence for man and God could construct.

Well, I suppose most people don't care about that last one. Most likely all you readers are wondering if I've decided to become a Nazi as some kind of sick joke on you. After all, who could possibly call the vilification of Adolf Hitler a bad thing?

What I mean is, contrary to popular opinion and even what we teach students in primary and secondary schooling, Adolf Hitler was not Great Satan. He had a wife, liked dogs and kept to a code of vegetarianism for his health. Hell, historical rumors say that Hitler even had an addiction to methamphetamine.

That would easily explain how a merely evil man could come to think and behave in a way more normally associated with mythological figures.

More importantly, characterizing Hitler as an earthly embodiment of Satan has allowed us to overlook the actions and inactions of ordinary people that followed him to commit his heinous sins. Ordinary Germans back in those days commonly believed in the delusions that Hitler's rhetoric confirmed for them.

Ordinary Germans also suffered from the Great Depression on top of hyperinflation, war debts and taking exclusive blame for World War I.

They needed a scapegoat and Hitler gave them one, with the kind of methodical madness that only a brilliant mind drunk on power, hatred, convenient lies and complete irreverence for man and God could construct.

We will never sympathize with it or like it, but we absolutely must understand it if we really wish "never again" to come true (so far it's failing utterly, particularly in Darfur). It's been our blessing that the generations of Germans who came after have so utterly repudiated everything that fascism stood for.

To truly get past and over the tragedy of all those years ago, we need to end – simultaneously, both the politicized morality of the post-World War II era that has made reductio ad Hitlerum one of the most popular logical fallacies and the paralyzing fear of ever coming within a league of those actions.

In truth, these come from the same thing: a profound fear of ever becoming quite so evil that it leads to fear of others then to anger. The fearful often become pacifists or communists, and unfortunately George Orwell's old statement that "pacifism is objectively pro-fascist" remains true to this day.

The angry make rules to guard humanity against fascism and evil and proceed to declare that anyone who crosses those lines is a Great Satan – just like Hitler.

This is the politicization process that has eventually resulted in declaring the flawed-but-noble United States and its allies (particularly morally-average-but-absolutely-necessary Israel) genocidal fascists while the United Nations Human Rights Council passed a resolution – backed by such nations as Sudan, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia – declaring defamation of religions, particularly Islam, to be a violation of human rights.

Really, we need to examine ourselves as individuals and as groups and to decide exactly what values we want to hold. We need to learn about mob psychology early enough that educated people will understand how to stand up for what's right even in the face of a large opposing group.

We need to declare that we will not merely live by our values, but enforce them by helping those in need – fulfilling the old proverb properly by "teaching a man to fish." We need to show that tolerating differences adds strength to our society instead of subtracting it and those we see no need to compromise between the morality of our actions and the effectiveness of those actions. We must fight when necessary even while we end fighting whenever it is safely possible.

In short, we need to understand that honor exists and remember that we must uphold ours. Then we can say "never again."

COURTESY MYSPACE

Concert-goers at the Pearl Street Night Club's clubroom Wednesday were treated to a role reversal. Opening act Titus Andronicus brought enough sound to fill a stadium while headliners Lucero were uninspiring with their tales of alcoholism.

Outshining the drink

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

There exists a fine line in the decision for a headlining band to choose their opener. Headliners must pick a band which will draw a relatively similar crowd as they would without opting for an act which will completely blow them out of the water. Most credible acts don't find this a challenge– they'll take a lesser band under their wing to give them exposure and let fans know they have good taste.

This was not the case Wednesday night at Pearl Street's clubroom, as Lucero, the Memphis, Tenn., headliner, was completely shown up by their opener Titus Andronicus. Next to Titus Andronicus, Lucero's aura shrank to that of a lowly bar band, crippled under their own tameness.

Titus Andronicus is a five-piece rock 'n' roll powerhouse from Glen Rock, N.J., fronted by the heavily bearded Patrick Stickles. To sum up their sound concisely, they sound like a modern punk rock Bruce Springsteen with more self-loathing, which is appropriate since they hail from the Boss' home state.

The band opened with "Upon Viewing Brueghel's 'Landscape With the Fall of Icarus'" which, while indicative of the sounds produced on their debut self-titled full-length, was not quite as wild as some other tracks they proceeded to delve into. However, "Icarus" did warn the audience of the sheer volume the band is capable of reaching, with three guitars, bass, Korg and drums crashing, crackling and buzzing as a cohesive wall of sound. These are stadium-sized rock songs filtered through a heavy layer of messy distortion, perfect for filling the room to the ceiling in a small club setting.

Second was "My Time Outside the Womb," another anthemic rock song, this time with added pop spirit. This number showcased Stickles' snarling bark, comparable to the meanest of junkyard rottweilers. His growls were often backed by rather angelic vocals, the three-part harmonies adding yet another layer to their dense buzz. "Joset of Nazareth's Blues" followed, seeing Stickles fervently blowing through a harmonica into the microphone in an attempt to make its sound audible through the rest of the noise. This may be their most patriotic-sounding song, again very Boss-like in delivery.

It didn't hurt that the crowd was on Titus' side - guitarist Ian O'Neil's parents were there as were old friends. "I grew up here," O'Neil said. "I used to play shows here when I was 16."

Eventually Titus got into another highlight from its LP, "No Future, Pt. 1," a restrained ballad which eventually produces fireworks. Stickles nursed a bottle of Budweiser while reciting the lyrics "all I've got is a bottle that I ought to leave alone, but it's the only thing that I can call my own," a provoking image of a man indulging in a vice while proclaiming it does him no good. He guzzled the remaining sips just as the song was on the verge of explosion, dropping the empty bottle in favor of his hollow body guitar.

Titus even went so far as to cover Springsteen, blasting out a solid version of "Badlands" before closing the set with one of its most fun (though fairly grim) songs, "Titus Andronicus." This number prolongs the theme of giving up booze, as Stickles claims "there'll be no more cigarettes, no more having sex, no more drinking til you fall on the floor."

He adds one more, "no more indie rock," which seems out of place seeing as Titus Andronicus is certainly not on a major label. However, Stickles also swore off booze directly after throwing back a couple, so his words are best taken with a grain of salt. A good number of concert goers even knew the beat of the claps towards the song's end, which concludes with repetitions of another bleak prospect: "Your life is over."

Perhaps it was the ringing ears, but there was no way Lucero could top the supporting act. The six Memphians took the stage, including singer Ben Nichols, and proceeded to underwhelm to an excruciating degree. One would hope and expect a band so beefed up with sonic capabilities to make more of a ruckus, but the two guitars, bass, pedal steel, keyboard and drums produced a mere murmur in the shadow of Titus Andronicus. Nichols struggled to vocalize coherently, gruffly mumbling about drinking, beers and bars.

Literally every song was about alcohol and, while alcoholism in general is a big issue, it's no fun having the prospect beaten to a pulp. It's as if one was required to have a bottle of cheap beer in their hand to enjoy Lucero's set. Since the overwhelming majority of concert-goers were indulging, it wasn't a surprise to see many enjoying themselves, even singing along and crowd surfing.

This is the kind of music to soundtrack a couple of old friends drunkenly throwing their arms around each other and reminiscing about the good times, unaware that the rest of the bar is annoyed at their babbling– think the classic Saturday Night Live "Bill Brasky" sketch.

This particular show should serve a lesson to mediocre bands – don't expect people to be too interested in your set if the opener is of such a high caliber. Titus Andronicus is going places, assuming the drink doesn't get the better of it like it seems to have done to Lucero.

Girl Talk's Sample Minded Ways

Mashup mixer or true artist?

By David Sarno
Los Angeles Time

It's difficult to imagine what it would cost for the licenses to use that material. Gillis certainly can't. He's one of free culture's colorful icons, and the title of his most recent full-length collection captures his general attitude toward the sorts of authority figures that worry about copyright law. He willfully ignores the rules and is perfectly comfortable rattling cages.

Of the 322 samples he deploys on "Feed," some are just a beat or two, others clip along for half a minute. Almost all are recognizable top 40 songs, and precisely none is used with the copyright owner's permission.

Since 2006, Gillis, who has no formal music training, has released two popular albums, received considerable media attention and played hundreds of shows, including major gatherings such as Lollapalooza and the Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival, where he'll perform for the second time on Friday. But he's managed to avoid legal skirmishes over artistic and intellectual property.

"It's three years later so it's not something I can lose sleep over every night," he said on the phone from his Pennsylvania home. "It's something I think about and it's part of the music. It's implied in all of the music, but at this point we haven't had any issues."

Not that it's much of a legal defense, but publicity is expensive and Gillis is a walking advertisement for the last four decades of pop music: His albums sound like a jukebox gone so haywire that it's put on five chart-topping records at the same time.

Gillis, 27, quit his job as a biomedical engineer a couple of years ago to compose and perform full time. He said he made about 10 percent of his income from selling his music online. His label, Illegal Art, is offering "Feed the Animals" for download on its Web site – fans can pay any price they would like for the collection.

The rest of his living comes from a grueling performance schedule, where Gillis upends convention by allowing his audience to jump onstage and dance around him; often he'll be swallowed up in the commotion, only to emerge, shirtless, to swan-dive into the crowd.

He arrives at shows with nothing more than a waterproof laptop that he uses to trigger and loop his vast catalog of samples.

"Gregg is playing your brain," said filmmaker Brett Gaylor, a friend of Gillis who featured the Pittsburgh-based artist in "RiP," a new documentary about remix culture. "He's playing your memories and your emotions. He's combining a song you made out with a girl to for the first time with a song that was playing when you were driving down the street in your first car."

Girl Talk's endless devouring and regurgitation of the pop music lexicon makes him a kind of hero to copyright skeptics such as Gaylor – those who believe that remix and reinterpretation are the main ways culture is generated. The "copyleft" movement decries the U.S. system of copyright as an outmoded framework that enables corporate entities to wall off the most popular works of art and entertainment.

But Gillis doesn't talk like an evangelist. From his perspective, he's a composer whose influences are just a bit more obvious than average.

What if you recognized a guitarist playing a sped-up version of a familiar riff, he asked, "and it's like, that's referencing the Ramones. But the melody and the way they're singing might be something slightly different. I don't see why you can't actually take the Ramones and chop it up, speed it up and add new drums. That becomes something new of its own."

Whether Gillis' original collages of recycled material are truly new is a question without a real answer. If he were taken to court by one of the hundreds of copyright holders whose music he's using, he'd likely have to argue that his sampling is a "fair use" of those works. But that kind of defense could be tricky, according to Ben Sheffner, who has worked as a litigator on behalf of 20th Century Fox and NBC Universal.

Sheffner said courts often consider how a derivative work could affect the market for the original – and if Gillis doesn't pay for music that's supposed to be licensed, why should everyone else?

"He has a considerable amount of skill and creativity," Sheffner said. "That said, doing (what he's doing) without a license is walking on very thin ice."

Of course, one artist's infringement is another's homage. On his album "Night Ripper," Gillis sampled the dreamy opening piano chords of 1992's "Damn I Wish I Was Your Lover," by Sophie B. Hawkins.

"When I was writing the song," Hawkins said from her L.A. recording studio, "just looping those chords on the piano is exactly what I did. I thought he used them beautifully. He's really an artist, and I felt complimented."

Mashup artist Gregg Gillis, aka Girl Talk, has drawn a mixture of praise and criticism for his sample-oriented releases. He will be performing May 3 at the Mullins Center as part of this year's Spring Concert.

Wide awake look at worry-based insomnia

By Kathleen Megan
The Hartford Courant

It's 1 a.m. You have to get up at 6. You're exhausted, but you can't sleep. What do you do?

You may find yourself slurping a spoonful of NyQuil or taking a Tylenol PM. Is that the best approach?

It all depends on how often you are in this situation, experts say.

Lynelle Schneeberg, a psychologist and director of the behavioral sleep medicine program at Gaylord Hospital in Wallingford, Conn., says that "if you're talking short-term insomnia during a short-term stressful situation," then taking a pill can be OK. But "chronic insomnia, when you are talking six months or longer, is a different animal."

For many, worries about jobs and the economy have been interfering with sleep. Almost one-third of Americans say their sleep has been disturbed at least a few nights a week in the past month because of personal financial concerns, the U.S. economy or employment worries, according to a survey by the National Sleep Foundation.

Taken once in a while, those over-the-counter medications might be just the push you need to shove off into dreamland, but there are downsides. For starters, the sedating effects caused by the antihistamine in such products as NyQuil and Tylenol PM may not end when you wake up. And if you take them frequently, they might even be associated with occasional memory problems.

Edward O'Malley, a sleep expert and owner of Optimal Sleep LLC in Easton, Conn., says that antihistamines can continue to affect people six to eight hours after ingestion.

Dr. Amarish Dave, a neurologist in Crystal Lake, Ill., says that many of these sedating medications can "slow cognitive performance." Whenever he sees patients complaining of "ot feeling "sharp mentally," he looks at what medications they have been using.

Taking sedatives can also cause problems for people with breathing disorders and occasionally can have cardiac effects in elderly people, O'Malley says.

Experts have varying opinions on herbal remedies. O'Malley says they may be preferable to over-the-counter sleeping medications, but he suggests that people use only synthetically made melatonin rather than any made from animal brain tissue.

Melatonin is the hormone secreted when the body is naturally preparing itself for sleep. O'Malley says it is most appropriate when used to address jet lag.

Schneeberg tells patients about the "every third night" rule when they ask about taking medications that may enhance sleep, whether the over-the-counter variety or prescription medications such as Lunesta or Ambien.

The theory is that if you sleep poorly on Monday night, you probably will have a sound sleep on Tuesday night. But sometimes that doesn't happen partly because people lie awake consumed with worry. ... But if you know that on the third night, Wednesday night, you'll allow yourself to take a sleep medication, Schneeberg says, sometimes that's all you need to ease yourself to sleep on Tuesday night.

"If you know that every third night is a rescue night, it lowers your anxiety," she says. "You really will never get into too much trouble if you take it every third night."

If you take sleep-enhancing medications every night, you "can become psychologically and physically dependent on them," Schneeberg says, and even lose your ability to get to sleep without taking something.

In general, however, sleep experts agree that the best way to address sleep problems is through behavior changes. Schneeberg teaches people how to behave when they can't sleep.

"They do all the wrong things with the right intentions," she says. "They lie in bed trying really hard to sleep. They will tell me, 'At least I'm resting,' but what they are doing instead: They are conditioning their bed to be a place associated with worry and frustration. ... We don't want bed to be associated with anything but drowsiness and sleep."

After 20 minutes of wakefulness, it's best to leave bed and do something quiet and relaxing, like reading, she says. It's best if this is done as near to the bedroom as possible without disturbing a partner. "Sometime the act of climbing the stairs wakes you up," she says.

Good sleep habits also involve going to bed and getting up at about the same time every day.

"The body loves routine," she says.

Other tips: A light snack before bedtime is OK, but not a heavy meal; exercise during the day to make you physically tired at night; avoid naps; and take whatever action you can to address your worries.

UM set to face Hawks

Host St. Joe's in 3–game set, finish up 4–game home stand

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team has four conference wins, but with a good showing against conference rival St. Joseph's, the Minutemen could put themselves in a very good position at this relatively early point in the season.

The teams in the Atlantic 10 Conference are so close to each other in wins and losses that a good series could mean the difference between a conference title contender and a team in the A-10 basement.

"We're playing at home for an extended period of time finally and we need to take advantage of that," UMass coach Mike Stone said of the Minutemen's four-game home stand.

"Saint Joe's is a much improved team. They've done well this year, they're ahead of us in the league and we need to make a move [in the conference]. It's a weekend that we need to take advantage of."

Last season the Minutemen (11-19, 4-8 A-10) traveled to Norristown, Pa., to take two of three from St. Joe's. In two of the three games, the winning team scored 10-plus runs. Overall, UMass outscored the Hawks, 22-21.

The Minutemen's best effort was a 12-5 win in the second game of the series. Second baseman Adam Tempesta went 3-for-6 with five RBI coming through twice with multiple men on base.

So far this season, Tempesta has 40 hits, good for second on the team behind outfielder Brian Baudinet, who has 41.

UMass comes into this weekend series against the Hawks (13-16-1, 7-4 A-10) in the bottom three in the conference in major offensive categories such as runs scored (169), hits (285) and runs batted in (157).

St. Joe's has below-average power (nine home runs) while the Minutemen have double that number – but the Hawks have a way of getting on base just the same. St. Joe's .401 on-base percentage is second in the conference but both teams have at least 200-fewer plate appearances than most of the teams in the A-10.UMass' conference-leading 40 sacrifice bunts show that Stone is willing to take chances with his runners this season but that's largely the extent of his "small ball" play. With 32 and 30 attempts respectively, the Hawks and the Minutemen have the lowest stolen base totals in the conference.

Yet with eight steals, St. Joe's outfielder Mike Coleman is a threat on the base paths. He is the only Hawk to have more than three steals on the season – three players have three. St. Joe's has allowed nearly 40 stolen bases this season and Stone may have a few players that could take advantage of that.

Baudinet is 6-for-8 in steal attempts and his .448 on-base percentage leads the team. Junior outfielder Mike Gedman is 4-for-5 in stolen base attempts this season and he's coming off a monster game against Boston College in which Gedman hit two home runs and grabbed his fourth stolen base of the season while striking out two in three innings pitched.

"It's just a matter of finding opportunities to get him in the lineup hitting-wise while keeping the other players that we have available to hit," Stone said about using the skills that Gedman has as both a pitcher and position player.

"That's going to be a challenge for everybody involved – to pick out the right people in the lineup and find the right places for them. We haven't had a consistent lineup this whole season but we need to make sure we have the best bats in the lineup and that our pitching is ready to go."

Gedman's 2.70 earned-run average is the lowest among Minutemen with 10 appearances or more.

The Minutemen are coming off a 12–8 victory over Boston College in Amherst on Wednesday and hope to continue their success at home in a three-game set with St. Joe's.

UMass takes No. 6 seed into A–10 Tournament

By Steven Levine
Collegian Staff

Aside from being the home of the World Series Champions, Super Bowl Champions, and possibly this year's Stanley Cup Champions, Pennsylvania will also be the home of the 26th annual Atlantic-10 tennis championships.

After a terrible finish to an adequate season, the UMass tennis team has earned the No. 6 seed in the upcoming Atlantic-10 Championships. The Minutewomen (9-13) will play the No. 11 seed Dayton at 1 p.m. on Friday. The only other meeting between these two took place in 1998, when UMass won.

If UMass beats Dayton, they will presumably go on to face No. 3 Xavier, last year's runner-up, at 6 p.m. that same day. UMass has played the Musketeers in the last three championships, winning two of three, including a win in the A-10 quarterfinals in 2007. Historically, UMass owns a 5-3 record against Xavier.

For UMass, a disappointing finish to the regular season had a lot to do with lineup inconsistencies. With top player Magdalena Ploch back in the lineup, UMass hopes to regain its early season form in an attempt at a title-run.

Richmond (14-5) comes into the tournament ranked No. 1, prompting many to pick the Spiders as the 2009 A-10 Champions.

Richmond is led by senior captain Pamela Duran, who owns an 11-5 singles record this year. Duran is a three-time All-Conference selection and was named the Most Outstanding Performer for the 2007 championship, Richmond's last A-10 title.

Last year's championship title belongs to Temple, who broke Richmond's four-year streak. Although considered the underdogs to the Spiders, the Owls (15-5) have a talented roster. Led by four players who earned 2008 All-Atlantic 10 honors, Temple is expected to make a deep run in this year's championships.

Rhode Island's successful season and No. 4 ranking can be attributed to youth, as three freshmen led the Rams to a stellar 14-2 season. Freshman Kirsten Leikem, the Rams' No. 1 player, hopes to continue her dominance in both singles and doubles, with her twin Tristany joining her in doubles matches. Along with the Leikem twins, fellow freshman Pam Emery has done her fair share of work, as the three have combined to win 50 singles matches this season.

The 26th annual A-10 Championships, dominated by two teams for the past seven years, could have a surprise in store. From teams plagued by injuries to teams reliant on freshman, anything could happen; championship status will have to be earned, not expected.

UMass coach Jim Dietz hopes to lead the Minutewomen to another Atlantic 10 Championship. UMass had won 12 consecutive conference titles before falling to Rhode Island last year.

UM races for 13th title in 14 seasons

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

For 12 straight seasons the Massachusetts rowing team headed to Pennsauken, N.J., to defend their conference championship. This Saturday, however, the Minutewomen will attempt to restore their dominance as they compete in the 14th annual Atlantic 10 Championship.

The Minutewomen held the longest streak in A-10 sports history, capturing 12 consecutive conference rowing titles. However, that impressive reign came to an end when Rhode Island edged out the Minutewomen by 15 points in last year's race.

UMass head coach Jim Dietz seems confident heading into the race, because he knows how hard his team has worked all season.

"In this sport if you work hard, you get results," Dietz said. "I think the girls really want to win this and they've been working hard towards it all year."

The work ethic of his team has been one of the strengths of the Minutewomen all season. And it showcases itself in the team's overall depth. Nine teams will compete this weekend for the division title and there will be a total of nine varsity races.

UMass has several underclassmen, but is led by their two senior captains, Molly Morgan and Airlina Burrill. Burrill, who was named to the Academic All Conference team last spring, is a part of the first Varsity quad that placed first in their race last season. The quad been very strong this season and placed first overall in the Knecht Cup last weekend.

URI will look to challenge the Minutewomen once again this season. The 2008 conference champions are lead by senior captains Mallory Fossa and Lauren Killea. The team also has senior Meghan Wolfe, who is a key part of a strong varsity eight team that was crucial in last year's title run – as they started the momentum by getting the team off to a great start. UMass won the first event of the day and never relinquished that lead.

Dietz said that the key to being successful this weekend will be to not lose track of their strongest A-10 rival throughout the day.

"We want to get as close to Rhode Island in every race that we can," Dietz said. "We know that they're really fast in the first varsity eight so if we just stay close, we'll be fine."

Saint Joseph's will also be looking to challenge the Minutewomen this weekend. They finished a close third recording 113 points in last year's race, just six points below UMass. Dayton and Duquesne came in fourth and fifth place, respectively.

The first heats on Saturday take place at around 8 a.m.; by approximately 1 p.m. in the afternoon, the winner of the A-10 rowing crown will be decided.

Baslchmiter invited to USA selecetion camp

Plourde grabbing A–10 awards, Minutewomen atop conference

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Brandice Balschmiter never needs to take a class on how to build a résumé.

The ace of the No. 17 Massachusetts softball team's pitching staff has let her work in the circle build her résumé for her. The latest addition to her résumé may be playing for the USA Olympic softball team.

UMass Softball

After striking out the 1,000 batter of her career on April 2 and breaking the UMass wins record of 108 games on April 14 – a record previously held by former Olympian Danielle Henderson – Balschmiter now has the opportunity to try out for the USA National team. The senior has accepted an invitation – as have 26 other athletes – to compete at the 2009 USA Softball Women's National Team Selection Camp.

"I am excited about having the opportunity to compete at the National Team level," Balschmiter said in an interview to Atlantic10.com. "It is an honor to be invited to the training camp and get the chance to meet and learn from players and coaches there."

The camp will take place from June 8-12 in Chula Vista, Calif. The team that is selected to represent the U.S. will then partake in a number of international events following the camp.

One of the events is the World Cup of Softball in Oklahoma City, Okla., on July 16-20. Participating in the World Cup will be the top four teams in the 2008 Olympic Games and a rematch of its gold medal game between the United States and Japan.

Along with the potential to play for the USA National team, Balchmiter's senior year has been full of feats and accomplishments. Back on Feb. 18, Balschmiter was drafted by the Chicago Bandits, the defending champions of the National Pro Fastpitch league with the fifth and final pick of the first round.

Balschmiter's 1,000 career strikeout made her only the second UMass pitcher to reach the feat – the other being Henderson who recorded 1,343. Balschmiter has also become just the third active pitcher in Division I to record 1,000 career strikeouts, the other two being Stanford's Missy Penna and Washington's Danielle Lawrie.

Rookie sensation

There is little Sara Plourde hasn't accomplished so far in her freshman season.

She's thrown a no-hitter – one hit batsmen away from a perfect game – on March 22 over Dayton (which won her the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week a day later) and she threw a one-hitter over Saint Joseph's last Friday to win her first ever A-10 Pitcher of the Week honor.

Plourde was also named Co-Rookie of the Week for the week of April 5 where she went 2-0 giving up only two earned runs and struck out 15 batters in 12 innings pitched.

On top of that, Plourde has a perfect 6-0 record to her name, winning each game she has started, and a slim earned-run average of 1.12 to lead the team. In 43.2 innings pitched this season, the rookie has struck out 65 batters while only walking 15 and held opponents to a .132 batting average, another team best.

Plourde has become a great compliment to Balschmiter on the pitching staff. She has demonstrated the ability to go after hitters aggressively with a wide arsenal of pitches, often getting ahead of hitters to open up the strike zone. Plourde has given UMass a legitimate one-two punch that will be needed to go deep in the NCAA Tournament in May.

Atop the A-10

As well as being atop the A-10 standings with an unblemished 8-0 conference record, the Minutewomen are on the top in many statistical categories in A-10 play as well.

As of April 13, UMass holds a conference-best .363 batting average and an A-10-best 12 home runs, despite playing the fewest number of games (8). The Minutewomen's 16 doubles is also the highest, one better than Fordham's 15 and their 25 strikeouts ranks second only to Charlotte's 24. The next closest to UMass is Fordham with 49 strikeouts.

With Balschmiter and Plourde leading the pitching staff, UMass is tops in most statistical categories there as well. The pitching staff together has posted a 0.82 ERA, followed by Fordham's 1.44 team ERA and has given up by far the fewest hits (21) and earned runs (6). No other team in the conference has given up fewer than 47 hits or 16 earned runs.

In the field, the Minutewomen have committed the fewest errors (4) in A-10 play but hold a .981 fielding percentage, second only to St. Bonaventure (.982).

Individually, UMass dominates the statistics. The top four batters in conference play are Minutewomen with Carly Normandin (.567) leading the conference. Freshman Kyllie Magill (.478) is second followed by Whitney Williams (.412) and Michelle Libby (.409). Normandin also leads the league in hits (17), doubles (5) and total bases (25), Magill is second in runs scored (10), Sarah Reeves is second in home runs (3) and third in RBIs (12) and Libby is tied for second in doubles (4).

The Minutewomen have won 15 straight games dating back to March 15. UMass hopes to extend the streak to 17 with two more wins this weekend over George Washington.

UM hosts GW in A–10 weekend set

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

It seems as if all is right in the world for the Massachusetts softball team.

UMass has won 15 straight games dating back to March 15 and in that span, the Minutewomen are not only hitting for power, but for consistency. And unfortunately for opposing teams, Brandice Balschmiter is truly in midseason form once again.

George Washington has a pretty tough time ahead of them when they travel to Amherst to take on the Minutewomen Friday and Saturday at the UMass Softball Complex.

The unpleasantness for the Colonials (12-25, 3-9 Atlantic 10) starts as soon as they step on the field. Balschmiter, coming off a no-hitter against Providence on Tuesday – the game where she also broke UMass' all-time wins leader Danielle Henderson's record – is nearly untouchable.

Wednesday's game against Boston University was much of the same. The senior only surrendered three hits in a complete game effort where she struck out 11 Terriers and only walked two in UMass' 3-0 win.

On the offensive half of the game the Minutewomen (25-6, 8-0 A-10) have found their power again and Carly Normandin has continued her hot streak.

Normandin, UMass' leadoff hitter, leads the Minutewomen in batting average (.429), runs (26), hits (45), doubles (10), total bases (74) and slugging percentage (.705). Essentially, Normandin is the perfect leadoff hitter, getting on base almost 50 percent of the time, which in turn immediately puts pressure onto UMass' opposing pitchers.

Not only are the Minutewomen reaching base more frequently than their counterparts, they are also hitting home runs at a much higher rate.

Compared to last year's numbers, the Minutewomen have hit only three fewer long balls than last year's version of the Minutewomen. Keep in mind that UMass still has 13 games left in the regular season.

And whenever UMass reaches the base paths, they usually aren't in the same place long.

The Minutewomen have stolen 40 bases this year, already tying last season's mark. Normandin leads UMass with 11 steals in 12 attempts. Kyllie Magill is second on the team with six steals in seven attempts.

The Colonials have had a tougher go at the plate than UMass has this season. Collectively, the Colonials are hitting .190 as a team with 12 home runs and 66 runs scored this season. GW's leading hitter, Katie Terrazas, leads the team with a .269 average with three home runs and 15 RBIs.

Despite the Colonials struggles at the plate, their pitching is pretty solid.

Amanda Gabriel leads GW with an ERA of 3.05 while sporting a 7-13 record. The Colonials' second pitcher, Kara Clauss, holds a 3.63 ERA and a 4-5 record.

If the Colonials want to end UMass' 44-game conference winning streak, their pitching is going to have to get it done and limit UMass from extra-base hits.

Cellucci speaks to UM campus

By Kirsten Swenson
Collegian Staff

Former Massachusetts Republican Gov. Paul Cellucci gave a speech entitled "Tax-and-Spend Massachusetts and Education Policy" last Thursday night in the Cape Cod Lounge at the University of Massachusetts.

The event, which was sponsored by the UMass Republican Club, was split into two parts – the first focused on past and present economic issues facing the Commonwealth from Cellucci's perspective, and the second on the relationship between public education and Massachusetts' fiscal policies.

Cellucci, who was the Commonwealth's lieutenant governor from 1991-1997, acting governor from 1997-1999 and governor from 1999-2001, focused a great deal of his time on fiscal discipline during his tenure in office.

"When we were elected, Massachusetts had the nickname 'Taxachusetts.' We worked very hard to rid that description of the state. At the time, Massachusetts had a high unemployment rate and a $2.5 billion deficit … ultimately, we knew we had to impose tough fiscal discipline," Cellucci stated. "Of course, citizens need to know that what we want to do is reasonable – the last thing we were going to do was overextend."

In 2000, Cellucci and his administration proposed to cut the state income tax from 5.95 percent to 5 percent, which ultimately passed with voters that November. As governor, Cellucci had experience maintaining the fiscal discipline policies he helped support as lieutenant governor, making cuts he deemed necessary.

Former governor of Massachusetts Paul Cellucci, above, visited UMass on Thursday, and was hosted by The Republican Club.

Cellucci voiced his concerns over the current spending policies of Gov. Deval Patrick, citing the appointment of State Sen. Marian Walsh to the assistant executive director of the Health and Educational Facilities Authority, a position that hadn't been filled for 12 years.

"This new appointment did not stand. Ultimately, Walsh had to say she wasn't going to take the position because the people of Massachusetts were angry," Cellucci said.

Cellucci switched gears when he began to talk about the Education Reform Act of 1993, which provided

Fulfilling a dream

Student writes her 1st novel

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

At the age of 19, she's already achieved a dream some authors may yearn for their entire lives.

Rachel Drummey, a freshman English and pre-med major at the University of Massachusetts, has written and published a novel from start to finish.

The novel, "Twins of the Golden City," tells the story of a 17-year-old girl named Lena who is born and raised in captivity.

Her captor is trying to train her to use the skills of magic that she possesses.

She manages to escape and goes north to another country where she meets people who also possess similar magic capabilities.

Together, they must band together to fight and defeat her captor.

The story is mostly "about how [Lena] changes and how other people change because of her," said Drummey.

"Twins of the Golden City" took Drummey about two and a half years to write.

She began by creating the characters, but chose not to write an outline for the plot of the book.

"The writing went really fast. It sort of felt like the characters were doing their own thing and I was just writing whatever happened. I knew the direction the story was going in, but it branched off in a lot of different ways I wasn't expecting," she said.

UMass freshman Rachel Drummey, above, has recently published her first novel, Twins of the Golden City, and is working on a sequel.

The book was completed near the end of 2007.

At that time, Tony Savageaou, one of Drummey's neighbors, asked to take a look at it.

Expecting student desires parking spot

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts undergraduate Michele Copeland, who is 36 weeks pregnant, has complained to the UMass Parking Services that she has not been properly accommodated, while the department says it followed its policy for issuing special parking permits to women in their third trimester of pregnancy.

Copeland, a commuter student from Springfield, said she paid to park at the meters near Boyden Gymnasium the few days a week she had classes last semester, but realized she would enter her third trimester in the spring and wanted to get a parking spot closer to her classrooms.

She said she contacted Parking Services in September soon after finding out she was pregnant. She said people at the department told her she would be accommodated in the spring if she provided a doctor's note. According to Copeland, she presented Parking Services with the note in February and the department said she could park in Lot 40, next to the meters of Boyden Gym.

"They were willing to give me parking that was nowhere near any of my buildings. I just don't think that their accommodations were good enough," Copeland said in a telephone interview. "I don't think that putting me in a parking lot right next to where I used to park is an accommodation."

But Michael Brennan, manager of UMass Parking Services, said Copeland received the same accommodations put forth in the department's policy on pregnant women in their third trimester, which is posted on the department's website and states, "Short-Term Special Needs Parking Permit holders in their third trimester of pregnancy qualify for a temporary Special Needs parking permit at no charge, provided a doctor's note with the due date is presented to Parking Services."

It also states that anyone in the UMass community requiring Special Needs Parking must first register with Disability Services, located in Room 231 of the Whitmore Administration Building.

"Regulations [of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990] forbid Parking Services to provide temporary handicapped parking permits unless an individual has already registered with the state for a placard or special license plate. A copy of the state application must be provided in order to receive a temporary permit," the policy states.

But Copeland, a 25-year-old senior majoring in psychology, said she was not aware of these policies when she first contacted Parking Services. She said that "no one reached out" to her to inform her of the policies and what she needed to do.

UMass can't save 1st place

MATTHEW THOMAS/COLLEGIAN

UMass goalkeeper Doc Schneider attempts to make a save against Georgetown Saturday at Garber Field on Senior Day. The Minutemen fell to the Hoyas, 10–7, however, dropping to second place in the Eastern College Athletic Conference standings with two league games remaining.

By Eli Rosenswaike

Massachusetts goalkeeper Doc Schneider wasn't the only one to get hit right where it counts in Saturday's conference tilt against rival Georgetown.

The Minutemen briefly lost their star goalie to an unpleasant injury before faltering down the stretch in a 10-7 loss to the Hoyas that – at least temporarily – cost UMass first place in the standings.

"I think every game is a character test, regardless of if you win or lose," said UMass coach Greg Cannella following the loss at Garber Field. "I tell our guys not to prepare any differently for certain games and hopefully they don't, and hopefully they bounce back and play well [Tuesday at Fairfield]."

Despite currently being in second place in the Eastern College Athletic Conference, No. 12 UMass (7-4, 4-1 ECAC) can clinch the league title and automatic berth into the NCAA Tournament with wins over Fairfield and Rutgers (May 2). First-place Loyola, which fell to the Minutemen on March 21, needs a win in its finale over Hobart and one UMass loss to claim the championship.

A victory over Georgetown (6-6, 2-3 ECAC) would have allowed the Minutemen to shore up the league by winning just one – or possibly even zero – of its two remaining conference games. But the Hoyas ruined UMass' Senior Day, jumping out to an early 6-2 lead that the Minutemen ultimately couldn't overcome.

"They had better composure than us on the offensive end. It just didn't go our way," Cannella said. "We were sloppy early. Every time we made a mistake – as a good team that they are – they pounced on us. [I'm] disappointed."

Led by its goalkeeper, UMass eventually overcame the struggles and battled back to a 6-6 tie early in the fourth quarter. The Minutemen seemed to get an emotional lift when Schneider – who was hit in the groin with a shot and lay on the ground in pain for a few minutes – returned to the field after missing 23 seconds of game time.

UMass scored the game's next four goals to tie it but the Hoyas scored the next three late in the fourth quarter to seal the win.

"Doc is obviously an emotional leader for our team," Cannella said.

One published, a sequel to come

had trouble getting his works published, had created a publishing company with one of his friends.

After Savageaou read the book and liked what he saw, he sent it to his editors and publishers at the company.

Several months later, they contacted Drummey to let her know her book would be published.

Drummey remembers the phone call when she learned that her story would be would become a book.

"I was freaking out when I found out about it. I was running around, screaming," she said, smiling.

"I didn't think this would ever happen. I just feel really lucky that I know Tony and that he helped me. Sometimes, it still feels crazy."

Adam Miller, a freshman business major at UMass, has written his share of short stories and poems, but was much more hesitant about writing an entire novel.

"I know I could never probably have the patience; I'd get bored with the story. But she stuck with it the whole time. That's a huge accomplishment for her," said Miller.

Sophie Kaner, a freshman English major, echoed Miller's sentiments.

"I was totally blown away when I found out she had already published a book before she even got here. She wrote the thing when she was in high school. It's a huge deal to make such a creative project and to have the focus and determination to get through that when you're in high school and applying to college and have so much on your plate," said Kaner.

Bookstores near Drummey's hometown have held book signing events for her, and most recently, Amherst Books hosted an event as well, which many of Drummey's friends and colleagues attended to support her and get their copies officially signed.

Drummey is currently working on the sequel, but she finds it challenging to write at college due to other responsibilities and the loud atmosphere of the dorm.

Finding the right balance between completing class work and working on her story is a difficult thing to achieve, she said.

"Class work has more of a deadline, so that takes priority But writing de-stresses me too so if I am getting stressed out from class work, I will take a break and write," said Drummey.

The sequel is almost completed, and Drummey said it is her goal to finish the book by the end of the semester.

There's only one other person besides Drummey that knows the content of the story: her father. After writing each chapter, she e-mails the writing segment to him.

He takes a look at it, edits it, and sends it back to her.

The edits from her father are important to Drummey, as she says that it provides a way for her to see how the story is perceived through another person's eyes.

"[My father] is much more less dramatic than I am, so sometimes I get carried away with the drama of the story and he'll say, 'Whoa, settle down,'" she said.

In addition to writing, Drummey is a member of Commonwealth College and is in the Pre-Med Society.

She is also volunteering at Children's Hospital in Boston this summer.

Her dedication to all the activities she participates in amazes many of her fellow classmates.

"She manages to handle all of it, and still do incredibly well with everything she does. She's writing the sequel right now, and still getting A's in everything. I've always been really impressed," said Kaner.

While Drummey would love the opportunity to write for a career, she added that she would need to be sure it would be enough to support her.

"I also love pre-med and I want to be a child psychiatrist," she said. "[But] writing is a part of me, and so I know I will always do it."

No one 'reached out' says pregnant student

Copeland said that she was sent what she felt was an intimidating reply after she e-mailed Parking Services to explain that she felt she was not properly accommodated. It was then that she found out about the policy. She said the e-mail stated that she should have spoken with a Parking Services supervisor or manager about her request.

"Honestly, I didn't really think that I would need to do something like that. I mean, people in the Parking Services Department should be trained to deal with these kinds of situations," said Copeland, adding that because she lives off campus she was unaware that the department had any managers or supervisors.

She said she thought it was possibly a student-run organization.

Copeland said she has refused to accept the department's accommodations because her due date, May 2, is coming up soon and because Lot 40 is no closer to her classes than the parking meters were. She said she now parks illegally or at a meter if it is close enough to one of her classes.

"I have a class in [the Isenberg School of Management building] so I'll park in those meters [in the horse-shoe-shaped road next to the building]," she said. "Just anything to get me close, because, honestly, it really is very difficult to get around at this stage in the pregnancy.

"They never said what they would do and maybe that's my fault for not checking into more," she continued. "But I assumed that I couldn't be the only person that ever needed any accommodations like this."

She added that though she knows it is illegal to issue pregnant women handicap parking spots, she thinks more convenient accommodations should be made to both pregnant women and other students with special needs.

Copeland spoke last week with a Parking Services supervisor who informed her she could try to change the policy by writing a letter to the office of UMass President Jack Wilson.

"I'm just realizing now that there has to be somebody to stand up for other women that are in my position or that come into this position," she said.

Brennan said Parking Services just followed protocol.

"Our office has successfully reached out to Ms. Copeland, and in accordance with the policy we have in place, we are accommodating her parking needs," he said in an e-mail.

Cellucci talks policies

more funding to schools through state income taxes and sales taxes.

As part of the act, the Massachusetts government devised a plan to provide more accountability in schools, leading to the development of the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System (MCAS), a test that students in Massachusetts public high schools must pass in order to receive a diploma. This test has received criticism across the state, particularly from teachers unions who do not feel it is appropriate to "teach to the test."

"If 'teaching to the test' means kids can add, subtract, multiply and divide, then lets do it," Cellucci said. "Massachusetts students are doing the best nationwide because we insist on accountability and standards. These standards are difficult to get rid of, because they will always hold true."

Sophomore finance major John Ha agreed with Cellucci's stance on the MCAS and fiscal discipline, stating, "I think he did a really good job presenting everything — he included both the good stuff and the bad stuff."

Junior political science major Molly Hartshorn disagreed.

"I still maintain that lowering taxes is not going to solve problems at all. By eliminating more revenue, nothing is going to get accomplished that has to be accomplished," said Hartshorn.

ASHLEY K. KIM/COLLEGIAN

Cellucci spoke to UMass students about the taxation and education policies he worked toward while in office and still supports today.

After the speech, Cellucci held a brief question-and-answer session in which audience members were able to address everything from his fiscal discipline policies to a discussion of the Iraq war.

No 2nd chance when plagiarism is involved

"So, she made a mistake. What's the big deal?"

It's a comment I've been hearing and reading a lot since former Massachusetts Daily Collegian writer Nicole Sobel admitted last week to plagiarizing parts of a New York Times article in her Collegian column entitled "Free-range, not bacteria-free."

There has been private as well as public debate on the incident, most notably on the Collegian's comments section accompanying the article, as well as the University of Massachusetts Journalism Department's blog, where I blogged about the issue as well.

Comments have varied, including versions of: "She made a mistake, move on." Or suggestions that folks should show her compassion, that college is a place to make mistakes. On the other end of the spectrum, many journalism students, both past and present, offer little sympathy for Sobel's admitted transgression.

"It certainly is that big of a deal, and unfortunately Ms. Sobel has to take the fall in order to prevent her fellow students from being taught the wrong lesson: that you can get away with this," wrote Mike Deehan, a 2007 journalism graduate, on the comments board to my blog entry.

"People are 'overreacting,' because the severity of the transgression has to be made clear. Yeah, it sucks that Sobel is being humiliated, but her experience will hopefully put the fear of God into anyone who may at some point be tempted to steal someone else's work," Deehan wrote.

So, what's the big deal? Is this a black-and-white issue or one with some grey?

We frequently talk ethics in my classes and while I guide the discussion, I often leave my own opinions out, preferring students work out the issue on their own. However, plagiarism is not one of those areas. In my syllabi I state the following:

"Academic dishonesty, including cheating, fabrication, facilitating academic dishonesty and plagiarism (including use of unauthorized photos, graphics or text from the Web) will not be tolerated."

We talk specifically about what plagiarism is in my classes. The clearest definition of plagiarism is a simple generic one used by many: Passing off someone else's work as your own. Journalism is tricky though, because we are interviewing, researching and ultimately writing about what others think. That is why journalism educators spend so much time talking about attribution. Sure, quote what others are saying, but let your readers know where the information is coming from.

"Transparency" is a concept many toss around but few practice. Yet it is a bedrock concept for journalists, one that helps reporters and editors develop credibility with their audience – whether online, in print, radio or television. And, credibility is the only currency we journalists can barter with. Lose that and it's time to move on.

"Credibility is everything in our business," says Matthew B. Lee, the editor for ESPN.com's Blog Network.

"Is the reporter – and by extension the news organization the reporter represents – a credible, trustworthy source for reliable, accurate, and balanced information?"

I often link to and quote Mindy McAdams, a professor at the University of Florida. "A journalist is expected to provide clear and true attribution for all sources, including copied text," writes McAdams on her blog. "It does not matter if you copied it from the Internet or from a newswire service. It is not yours. Don't pretend it is."

"If you violate the ethics of journalism on the job, you could be fired," writes McAdams.

Sobel has been fired from The Collegian. But I often wonder whether students think we journalism educators exaggerate about the ramifications of ethical lapses, despite the lessons provided by Janet Cooke, Jayson Blair and others.

Ann Thompson, a former colleague of mine at The Washington Post, reminded me that I wasn't exaggerating. She recounted one incident with an intern during her time as metro editor for The Post's website. The intern had an assignment to do a mental health story and as Thompson read it, a quote assigned to a named source didn't quite read right to her. When she asked the intern for clarification, the intern said she made the source up.

Within hours Thompson and another editor escorted the intern down to the Human Resource coordinator to officially end her internship. While Thompson told me the experience was awful, she told the intern that she had committed an egregious breach of journalistic ethics and that the risks of keeping her around were too great.

"No second chance. No 'mistake.' No tolerance of explanation. Huge risk to newsroom. Not worth it. The end," Thompson added.

I can hear it now: "Oh, Lou, lighten up, isn't the college environment a place to learn from such mistakes?"

Almost every practicing journalist I have spoken with gave little breathing room when it came to plagiarism, regardless of setting.

ESPN.com's Lee was blunt. "Plagiarism is lazy and deceitful and not an accident that can simply be 'apologized' for. It is a conscious act. Typos are accidents. Plagiarism is not an accident and it is an act for which there is tangible, irrefutable evidence."

Clearly there is a lesson to be learned here.

The journalism profession is an exciting one. Despite the continued transformation, I think the industry will survive. It will just be constructed a little differently. Yet, as more and more news organizations focus on their online operations and begin to pursue partnerships, the environment will get even more intense. The pressures to be first will heighten. Many of the ethical principles you learn in college will be challenged.

I realize and understand students are under mounting pressures to perform. Juggling school obligations, jobs, family, friends, significant others, social schedules, etc., can seem overwhelming at times. But, if you're planning on going into journalism, those are pressures that will gross geometrically once you enter the business. And, ultimately, missing a deadline, handing in a paper or getting to a party late are situations easily rectified. Breaching an ethical principle such as plagiarism isn't.

We live in a society where we try to explain away much. How much time did we spend parsing what the definition of is, is? The concept of accountability has been subsumed by a culture searching to shift blame and pass off excuses.

Compassion is one thing, reality is another. We as educators need to do a better job of teaching students to understand the ramifications of their actions and to be accountable. To me, that's true compassion.

Looking back to a time when community trumped industry

Chris Amorosi

Now that we live in the future, I enjoy quaint reminders of the past. Relics of a simpler time before I commuted via pneumatic tube and wrote columns with my brain interface for Word 3000. So I took some time last Friday to enjoy a historically themed Community Cookbook event at the Marriott Center.

A class in the Hospitality and Tourism Management major collected recipes from old cookbooks and contributed by the locals to create the menu. There was stuffed corned beef eaten by Theodore Roosevelt while he was storming San Juan Hill, fish chowder sipped on lonely midnight watches on Yankee clippers, sugar cookies munched by Benjamin Franklin as he furiously wrote to meet his Alcmanac deadlines and some kind of pork I didn't like and thus it is lost to history.

The second most enjoyable part of the night, between unlimited food and coffee, was my venerable company. They were four self-described "old ladies" who warned me that they knew one another quite well when they sat at my table.

Three of them were in their late 80s and the fourth, the baby of the group, was around 55. While they asked me who I was and what I do, I neglected to ask them the same for I lack the social graces. I also feared I might habitually curse, as we young Turks are apt to do.

Once settled with their chowders and teas, they began to reminisce and I listened. The topic was refrigeration. The three elder ladies talked about life before the home refrigerator became widespread in 1950s. To keep their food preserved, the whole neighborhood relied upon the ice man.

Today's plastic-wrapped, SUV-driven world is like, and was born from, a fridge of yesteryear: inefficient and wasteful conveniences without foresight.

Ice men were like milk men, but instead of milking cows, the ice men would cut blocks of ice out of lakes. They coated the blocks with sawdust and delivered ice door to door on horse-drawn carts. Children knew to treat the ice man well so he would give them a sliver of ice as a snack.

The idea of taking snacks from a stranger certainly shocks my afternoon special-honed sensibilities. Didn't these people know that rapists like to poison children with free snacks?

The ladies themselves commented on just that idea. Their answer was that children somehow knew better in those days. Children were hardier and wiser. They were heroic characters straight out of "Oliver Twist," artfully dodging those who wished to harm them.

I counter their good ol' days with an anecdote of my own – one of how my grandmother, who is about as old as they come, tells us stories about her neighbor's abusive relationship with her children. One of the children would come by my grandmothers' house and she would wash him up and give him a nickel in a futile effort to make him feel better.

Anecdotes aren't quite as good as evidence, but I think they're enough to dispel an idyllic picture of the past. The ladies even provided me with a metaphor to further feed my cynicism.

One of them talked about her first refrigerator. After it was retired from home use, she put the fridge in her summer cabin, where light duty kept it running until a few years ago. She talked lovingly of its tiny freezer compartment that could fit perhaps a pint of ice cream and how when she plugged in the fridge the house's electric use soared.

Today's plastic-wrapped, SUV-driven world is like, and was born from, a fridge of yesteryear: inefficient and wasteful conveniences without foresight.

But perhaps I am too cynical about the past. Let's go back to the ice men. They were a respected neighborhood institution performing a vital function with regularity. A lot of them probably were friends to children instead of rapists. The ladies lamented an innocence that didn't actually exist. But they also lamented the real loss of community. Who are the ice men today?

I don't wish to romanticize the ice man and I wouldn't trade in my refrigerator for his return. Instead, I suggest that community was lost with the ice man and a replacement wasn't found because the replacement only addressed the material role of an ice man.

Our standards of living undeniably rose with the change. But is the change sustainable if we rely upon India and China to build us refrigerators rather than us chopping up a frozen-over local lake? We individually have a closer, dependent relationship to Chinese manufacturers than to our neighbor. Our neighbors are not ice men, so our livelihoods do not depend on them any longer. So what interest do we have in helping our neighbor?

What happens if we can no longer depend on distant factories but lack the community safety net of the past? Even medieval peasants had more security than we do. Either a whole village starved or everyone ate. If a village let individual families starve and die off then the village as a whole would shrink, be less able to produce food and die off itself. I'd like to see the village safety net return. Perhaps the economic crisis today will force the issue.

Britain's got mediocre talent

Jon Peterson

I have a theory about why Susan Boyle has become as widespread and popular a YouTube star as she has.

First, I would like to point out the extent to which Boyle has distinguished herself. Since April 11, different videos of her "Britain's Got Talent" performance have garnered more than 50 million views. One of the videos of her performance is among the most discussed videos of all time, with hundreds of thousands of comments. Boyle has also been invited onto "Larry King Live" and "The Oprah Show."

Boyle, a 47-year-old who proclaims to never have been kissed, grew up in a small town in England, lives with her cat, Pebbles and was bullied as a child because of her looks, has become one of this industry's biggest successes. She comes across not only as a truly lovely person, but as an inspirational story. Many describe her as "incredible," "brilliant" and as having the "voice of an angel."

However, performances of similar qualities have been performed on other broadcasts of this show and "American Idol" before, as well as in many different places, by performers who were more attractive and whose life stories were far less well known, while getting far less attention.

And while Boyle had a good performance, her voice is "pitch" at time. While she is quite a bit better than average, she is not nearly as skilled as one might expect for such a following, unless they had been expecting a far worse performance to begin with.

We all know that shows like "Britain's Got Talent" and "American Idol" play up many of the worst contestants in the first few episodes. It helps to shock the person when they hear people who are good at what they were doing – especially if they weren't expecting them to be. When someone is given dog food all the time and you give them a hamburger, it's not really a wonder that it would taste like steak.

A lot of people are "surprisingly good," and could be "good with training." But in reality, it takes more than that to break out and make a name for yourself.

So when we are presented with a person who Simon Cowell and various audience members roll their eyes at and is the epitome of a person who has "never been given a chance" and exceeds the low standards that we have set for her, we find her extraordinary.

Here are my two reasons for why Boyle is so important to us as an audience.

My first reason: We enjoy fairy tales.

While we would enjoy thinking that Boyle's performance and the video of her was unedited, it fits far too perfectly to be completely objective. Cowell's recording agency is trying to make stars, and that is exactly what it has done with the rather picturesque way it portrayed Boyle's struggle, as if she was David vs. Cowell's Goliath.

My second reason: Many of us want to think of ourselves as morally superior to those who would be fairer in their assessments of this lady's talent.

I spoke recently to Max Denmat, a Berklee College of Music-trained musical engineer. He told me that Boyle was "not all that good." And while artists can audition for schools like Berklee, The Juilliard School and the different conservatories around the country, where acceptance is based on skill, much of this woman's fame seems to stem from her poor looks and her sad story. Other musicians, such as current "American Idol" finalist, Adam Lambert, spend years perfecting their craft. Lambert himself has trained and performed regularly as an actor and singer since he was 10.

After Boyle's performance, judge Amanda Holden said the crowd and herself had been "cynical" of her, and that her performance was "the biggest wake-up call ever." Yet, numerous YouTube commenters reawakened that same cynicism by calling out members of the audience in the video with comments like "What a loser at 1:24," "I wonder what the bitch with the black hair at 1:24 has to say now" and the even more overtly judgmental "To the girl at 1:24, get a nose job."

Given that she "could be great with a bit of training," the fact is that singers like Adam Lambert are amazing, specifically because they have devoted their time to training. A lot of people are "surprisingly good," and could be "good with training." But in reality, it takes more than that to break out and make a name for yourself. After 47 years without any real show, it seems unlikely that she has really wanted to succeed as a singer. And if we decide to treat her differently now than we would have if we hadn't noticed anything to begin with, how would we be doing anything but shifting the discrimination to everyone else who she was competing against?

I truly do hope that Boyle does get some money out of this. She is a worthy person who is living a fairy tale that she deserves. The most worrisome thing, though, would be for everyone else to judge their morals by judging people by different standards because of things that are only skin deep.

Entertaining, but lets down

'Dragonball Evolution' a disappointment for fans

By Nora Drapalski
Collegian Correspondent

On April 10, the American public faced the biggest terror to hit the silver screen since "Street Fighter" in 1994. "Dragonball Evolution" shows what happens to a good foreign story when it is adapted to fit American standards.

James Wong, director of "Final Destination 3," brings Dragon Ball, a legendary Japanese manga series, to life in a live-action version.

In this modern adaptation, the story has been altered to suit a semi-plausible, yet severely overdone plot. The energetic hero has become a shy school boy, infatuated with the popular girl in his high school. He hides his inner strength from the other students, not wanting to scare his crush. This is trite and unbearably annoying.

But wait – there's more. In swoops, the evil villain killing off his stereotype-conforming Asian grandfather within the first 10 minutes. Now, the hero must avenge his grandfather's death and protect the world from devastation, with the help of Bulma and crazy Master Roshi.

As if this weren't enough, there's even a party scene – Yes, a party scene – where the school dork dares to trespass on the cool kid's turf. After 20 minutes, it leaves you wondering, is there even a bit of this movie that doesn't fall into the teenage drama category?

Well, 84 minutes of PG material will do that to one of the most action-packed series of all time.

"There were only two parts that were consistent with the anime, when Goku's stuffing his face with a chicken leg and when he ends up with Chi Chi [the wife of Goku, the protagonist of the "Dragon Ball" series]," said local "Dragon Ball" fan Alicia LaRosa.

Everything else, LaRosa explained, was dramatically different from the original story.

The film even features the stereotypical teen drama party scene, where Chi Chi's house is more like a celebrity's mansion than a high school girl's home.

And if the American producers didn't desecrate the story enough, they even throw in a romantic pairing that conflicts with a pairing in the original story.

"Dragon Ball" is the worst nightmare of fan of the series.

The acting is, at best, mediocre.

Justin Chatwin, who plays Goku, was not a horrible choice by casting director Carla Hool. However, he simply did not believe in his character. An actor is only as good as the script he is given, so for that, Chatwin must be pardoned for not doing a dynamite job.

There was no excuse for the performance Emmy Rossum gave for Bulma. With brown, waist-length hair and a single blue streak, Rossum's portrayal of Bulma is the polar opposite of the original character. Rossum drops her voice severely for this role, as though her character's intelligence prevents her from being feminine.

Unfortunately for fans, both Yamcha and Master Roshi are disappointing as well. Yamcha, a roguishly handsome bandit in the animated series, is portrayed by Joon Park, a handsome man in real life, but distressingly ugly in the film.

Master Roshi, played by the amazingly talented Chow Yun-Fat, was ill-cast. It is insulting to have a talented actor play an 80-year old, perverted master, only to be criticized for being too young and fit for the role.

But, "Dragonball: Evolution" does have some redeeming qualities.

James Marsters flawlessly assumed the role of the villain Piccolo. Marsters mastered the role as the powerful alien who, with one flick of the wrist, levels a house in seconds. Possibly most true to the manga, Marsters makes Piccolo an intimidating green-skinned enemy bent on controlling ultimate power. With the exception of some costume changes and the source of his ultimate defeat (remember, good must defeat evil), Marsters could not have been a better choice for the live action adaptation.

For fans and newcomers alike, the movie is incredibly entertaining. Whether its fans pointing out every discrepancy, or excited children laughing at the humorous facial expressions of the actors, the movie captivates audiences.

And for all 84 minutes of it, "Dragonball: Evolution" left audiences eager to see what happened next. While the storyline may be predictable, there is still the excitement of seeing how the director portrayed the scene.

There were even some surprises for diehard fans that the trailers skillfully excluded. "Dragonball: Evolution" combined comedy, drama, and action into a delightful package that is worth the $10 admission ticket. "Dragonball: Evolution" has something for everyone as it provides the perfect balance of fantasy and reality in an extraordinary lighthearted film.

Justin Chatwin plays Son Goku in the new film "Dragonball Evolution." The film is a live-action version of the legendary Japanese manga series Dragon Ball, but is a disappointment to die-hard fans of the original series.

Girl Talk and his 'Illegal Art'

Gillis includes variety of music, avoids copyright laws

By David Sarno

It's difficult to imagine what it would cost for the licenses to use that material – Gillis certainly can't. He's one of free culture's colorful icons, and the title of his most recent full-length collection captures his general attitude toward the sorts of authority figures that worry about copyright law. He willfully ignores the rules and is perfectly comfortable rattling cages.

Of the 322 samples he deploys on "Feed," some are just a beat or two, others clip along for half a minute. Almost all are recognizable top 40 songs, and precisely none is used with the copyright owner's permission.

Since 2006, Gillis, who has no formal music training, has released two popular albums, received considerable media attention and played hundreds of shows, including major gatherings such as Lollapalooza and the Coachella Valley Music and Arts Festival, where he'll perform for the second time on Friday. But he's managed to avoid legal skirmishes over artistic and intellectual property.

"It's three years later so it's not something I can lose sleep over every night," he said on the phone from his Pennsylvania home. "It's something I think about and it's part of the music. It's implied in all of the music, but at this point we haven't had any issues."

Not that it's much of a legal defense, but publicity is expensive and Gillis is a walking advertisement for the last four decades of pop music: His albums sound like a jukebox gone to city wire that F.C. put on five chart-topping records at the same time.

Gillis, 27, quit his job as a biomedical engineer a couple of years ago to compose and perform full time. He said he made about 10 percent of his income from selling his music online. His label, Illegal Art, is offering "Feed the Animals" for download on its Web site – fans can pay any price they would like for the collection.

The rest of his living comes from a grueling performance schedule, where Gillis upends convention by allowing his audience to jump onstage and dance around him; often he'll be swallowed up in the commotion, only to emerge, shirtless, to swan-dive into the crowd.

He arrives at shows with nothing more than a waterproof laptop that he uses to trigger and loop his vast catalog of samples.

"Gregg is playing your brain," said filmmaker Brett Gaylor, a friend of Gillis who featured the Pittsburgh-based artist in "RiP," a new documentary about remix culture. "He's playing your memories and your emotions. He's combining a song you made out with a girl to for the first time with a song that was playing when you were driving down the street in your first car."

Girl Talk's endless devouring and regurgitation of the pop music lexicon makes him a kind of hero to copyright skeptics such as Gaylor – those who believe that remix and reinterpretation are the main ways culture is generated. The "copyleft" movement decries the U.S. system of copyright as an outmoded framework that enables corporate entities to wall off the most popular works of art and entertainment.

But Gillis doesn't talk like an evangelist. From his perspective, he's a composer whose influences are just a bit more obvious than average.

What if you recognized a guitarist playing a sped-up version of a familiar riff, he asked, and it's like, that's referencing the Ramones. But the melody and the way they're singing might be something slightly different. I don't see why you can't actually take the Ramones and chop it up, speed it up and add new drums. That becomes something new of its own."

Whether Gillis' original collages of recycled material are truly new is a question without a real answer. If he were taken to court by one of the hundreds of copyright holders whose music he's using, he'd likely have to argue that his sampling is a "fair use" of those works. But that kind of defense could be tricky, according to Ben Sheffner, who has worked as a litigator on behalf of 20th Century Fox and NBC Universal.

Sheffner said courts often consider how a derivative work could affect the market for the original and if Gillis doesn't pay for music that's supposed to be licensed, why should everyone else?

"He has a considerable amount of skill and creativity," Sheffner said. "That said, doing (what he's doing) without a license is walking on very thin ice."

Of course, one artist's infringement is another's homage. On his album "Night Ripper," Gillis sampled the dreamy opening piano chords of 1992's "Damn I Wish I Was Your Lover," by Sophie B. Hawkins.

"When I was writing the song," Hawkins said from her L.A. recording studio, "just looping those chords on the piano is exactly what I did. I thought he used them beautifully. He's really an artist, and I felt complimented."

Gregg Gillis, or Girl Talk, is known for his ability to mix different artists' music to create a song that sounds like a jukebox gone haywire. Gillis has avoided copyright infringement with his music thus far in his career.

Ballard, a visionary with a sharp edge

By David L. Ulin
Los Angeles Times

If J.G. Ballard – the visionary British novelist who died Sunday of prostate cancer at 78 – ends up being remembered, it probably will be as a science fiction writer who aspired to use genre as a vehicle for art. That's true enough, in a certain small-bore manner, but it's ultimately reductive, a way of categorizing Ballard that his entire career stood against.

A member of the New Wave science fiction movement of the 1960s, Ballard started out writing proto-environmental thrillers that highlighted the prescience of his imagination: "The Wind From Nowhere" posits a worldwide windstorm that becomes apocalyptic, while "The Drowned World" is about a planet swamped by risen seas.

It was really in the 1970s, however, that Ballard found his voice as a writer, focusing on the dangers of mechanization and socialization, the tension between the veneer of civilization and the animal brutality it sought to conceal. Novels such as "Crash" and "High-Rise" uncovered the organic possibilities of violence years before the concept became common cultural currency: "Vermilion Sands" and "Running Wild" investigated a nightmare suburbia where chaos simmered beneath the landscaped surfaces of subdivisions and lawns.

It's easy, from the perspective of the present, to minimize just how revolutionary all this was: we now live, after all, in Ballard's world. Ballard, though, produced work that not only challenged his audiences but also actively provoked them, in some cases literally moving people to vandalism, as when he staged a 1970 exhibition of crashed cars at a London art gallery. This show, intended to illustrate the fetishization of machinery and violence, was a seminal moment for Ballard: It led to the publication of "Crash" in 1973, a novel about automobiles and violence, and the eroticism of car crashes (which was turned into a 1996 film by David Cronenberg).

"The marriage of reason and nightmare which has dominated the 20th century," the author wrote in a 1974 introduction to the French edition of the novel, "has given birth to an ever more ambiguous world. Across the communications landscape move the specters of sinister technologies and the dreams that money can buy. Thermonuclear weapons systems and soft drink commercials coexist in an overlit realm ruled by advertising and pseudoevents, science and pornography. Over our lives preside the great twin leitmotifs of the 20th century – sex and paranoia."

Ballard is best known for his autobiographical novel "Empire of the Sun," which described his boyhood experiences in a Japanese internment camp in Shanghai, China; it was filmed by Steven Spielberg in 1987. But for me – as well as, I suspect, most Ballardites – the signal text remains "The Atrocity Exhibition," a book so strange it's nearly impossible to describe.

Collecting 15 "stories," all of them so compressed and fragmentary as to render traditional concepts of narrative or character moot, it provoked its own kind of violent reaction. After the book was published in 1970, notes the 1990 RE:Search Publications edition, "Nelson Doubleday saw a copy, and was so horrified he ordered the entire press run shredded."

According to Ballard, the story that pushed Doubleday over the edge was a piece about Ronald Reagan, the title of which I can't reproduce here. This same story was the subject of a 1968 British obscenity trial, after the Unicorn Bookshop in Brighton published it as a pamphlet, when asked by his attorney why it was not obscene, Ballard replied "that of course it was obscene, and intended to be so." Needless to say, he did not appear as a witness in his own defense.

That's a funny moment, but it's also deadly serious, suggesting the essence of Ballard's aesthetic, his point of view. For him, obscenity was a matter of cultural obsession; it was not his work per se but our fixation on the figure of Reagan that made the story fit the charge.

"The Atrocity Exhibition" is full of such revelations. The final story, "The Assassination of John Fitzgerald Kennedy Considered as a Downhill Motor Race" (after Alfred Jarry's "The Crucifixion Considered as an Uphill Bicycle Race"), is as transgressive a piece of fiction as can be imagined, seven years after the death of the president.

"Oswald was the starter," Ballard begins, then takes us through a schematic of the shooting, concluding, "Without doubt Oswald badly misfired. But one question still remains unanswered: who loaded the starting gun?"

Here, we see Ballard's preoccupations come together: violence, spectacle and mass imagination, examined in a prose as flat and unaffected as an autopsy report.

"In a totally sane society," he once wrote, "madness is the only freedom" – an idea that sits at the center of "The Atrocity Exhibition," and, indeed, of his entire career.

Quote of the Day

"A conservative is a man with two perfectly good legs who, however, has never learned to walk forward."

- Franklin D. Roosevelt

Balance is the key. Balance is the key to many things. Do we understand balance? The word "balance" has seven letters. Seven is difficult to balance. But not impossible if we are able to divide. There are, of course, the pros and cons of division.

Hoyas ruin comeback with 4th quarter rally

"He got it in a spot where it hurts, so he had to come out of the game. He didn't want to come out, but he had to because if you stop play, you have to. Anytime he's in there it boosts our energy."

After regaining the momentum to tie the score, UMass quickly lost it again. Hoyas' goalkeeper Jack Davis (14 saves) made several key stops and Scott Kocis put his team up for good with his third goal of the game with 7 minutes, 51 seconds remaining in the contest.

Andrew Brancaccio and Ricky Mirabito added insurance goals to seal the victory.

"It's a good win. This team has worked hard all year and we've had some real close losses and we've had a season that hasn't gone quite like we're used to," Georgetown coach Dave Urick said. "For now, we'll savor this one."

The Hoyas, which were ranked No. 7 in the preseason coaches' poll, had struggled this season in close, late-game situations. But a dominant fourth quarter put an end to that. After UMass' Evan Blum tied the score on a shot from a nearly impossible angle at the 12:48 mark, Georgetown regrouped and forced turnovers, got nearly every ground ball and peppered Schneider (18 saves) with shots to ensure the victory.

"I told them at halftime that [UMass] was going to have a run in them, and we have to be able to absorb it. And sure enough, they did," Urick said. "That first goal we got in the fourth quarter was big and we were able to build on that."

Jim Connolly, Tim Balise and Evan Blum all scored two goals for the Minutemen, while Bobby Hayes added one. Jake Samperton also had a hat trick for Georgetown, which jumped out to a 4-1 lead after the first quarter. UMass hadn't allowed more than two goals in the first quarter in any game this season.

"Maybe not focusing as much as on the task at hand," said Cannella, regarding the slow start on Senior Day. "It's a tough one. It's an emotional one for a lot of guys, emotional for me as well."

Game notes

UMass dropped from No. 12 to No. 15 in the media poll, which was released on Monday. Georgetown, which was one spot out of the Top 20, moved up to No. 16 in the new poll. ... The Minutemen scored their final goal (Blum) with 13 seconds remaining in the game. Michael Shotwell added one for the Hoyas with two seconds left. ... UMass lost the battle in shots (47-35), ground balls (37-26) and faceoffs (13-7). Georgetown leads the all-time series, 7-3.

ball moved back across the plate and it hit her bat and the wind took it over the fence. Any other day it would have been a pop up."

Besides the one miscue, Balschmiter cruised through the game, scattering two other hits.

UMass, however, had similar trouble figuring out Gabriel, GW's pitcher.

The Minutewomen got six hits, three of which came from Salato. Sarah Reeves also went deep for UMass, following Salato's long ball in the fourth inning.

"I thought we struggled a lot at the plate. I think that most of our order was not in a good spot," Sortino said. "Brandice pitched an outstanding game. The kid comes up with a .150 batting average and puts the bat on it and the wind did the rest."

Game 2 was a bit different, but the outcome was the same.

UMass scored one run in the first three innings thanks to a first-inning home run from Salato, a second-inning home run by Audrey Boutin and a throwing error by GW's catcher, Amanda Holst, in the third.

UMass added three more runs in the fifth and another in the sixth to give the Minutewomen a 7-0 win.

Balschmiter had a solid outing once again – only allowing two hits while striking out 10 for her 20th win of the season.

In the bottom of the ninth with a runner on for St. Joe's, senior infielder Sam Boone made a diving stop, robbing a multi-base hit from David Valesente, recording the first out of the inning for UMass.

With two outs and the tying run at the plate, senior infielder Adam Tempesta moved to his right, scooped the ball and threw to first for the game's final out.

Macdonald hit his fourth home run of the season, as the Minutemen have hit 13 homers in the past four contests – all of which have been victories.

"You don't practice hitting home runs, you practice taking quality swings and that's what we are trying to do" and it has a lot to do with their success," Stone said.

UMass got another complete-game win on Saturday. Sophomore Nick Serino went the distance, winning his third game of the season.

The southpaw got plenty of run support, as all nine UMass starters registered a hit in the game. With Mike Gedman went 3-for-4 with four RBIs and a run scored, while Boone went 3-for-5 with two runs scored.

"It's been a difficult start to the season with a lot of distractions to deal with; and then some tough losses and they've hung in there to their credit," Stone said.

Crucial ECAC meeting with Fairfield next on schedule

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Teams control their own destiny from the start of the season. But with the final weeks of the lacrosse season ahead, it is even more important to win the critical games.

The No. 16 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has three games left, two conference games, in regular-season play. Each matchup determines the Minutemen's chances at an NCAA Tournament berth.

After UMass' 10-7 loss to Georgetown on Saturday, Loyola (8-4, 5-1 Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference) moved to first place in the conference. The Minutemen (7-4, 4-1 ECAC) are second and Tuesday's opponent Fairfield (6-5, 3-2 ECAC) sits at third.

The team atop the ECAC earns an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament. UMass can clinch with a victory in both remaining ECAC games. A tie at 6-1 in the standings gives the Minutemen the championship, because they hold the head-to-head tiebreaker over Loyola thanks to a win on March 21.

If the Greyhounds fall to the Statesmen, UMass will need just one win in its final two to win the ECAC.

The Minutemen travel to Fairfield on Tuesday and will play their final ECAC game against Rutgers on May 2.

If Loyola takes the top spot, UMass might still have a chance to earn an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament. To have a chance for a bid, UMass must beat No. 2 Syracuse on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

The loss to Georgetown snapped UMass' four game winning streak and gave away its first-place position in the ECAC. Going into the final stretch, the Minutemen must play a more complete game against Fairfield than they did against the Hoyas.

"I think every game is a character test, regardless if you win or lose. Last week was, the week before was. I don't think it's any different," UMass coach Greg Cannella said after Saturday's 10-7 loss to Georgetown. "We tell our guys don't prepare differently for certain games. Hopefully they don't and hopefully they come back, bounce back and play well."

After the loss, the Minutemen realized what they need to do to finish off the season and move on to postseason play. They are using Saturday's game as motivation against Fairfield.

"We just got to do our best to learn from our mistakes," senior Tim Balise said. "[Be] sharper on offense and give a little bit more of an effort all over the field. Try to use this to motivate us to try and play as hard as we can on Tuesday."

Fairfield, a team that isn't in the running for a berth into the NCAA Tournament, is coming off a 12-7 loss to Loyola (April 18). The Stags have lost their last three games after ending a four-game winning streak with an 11-8 loss to Georgetown on April 4.

UMass leads the all-time series between the two teams 6-1, including a 2-0 record while playing at Fairfield. Last season, the Minutemen fell at home to the Stags with an 8-7 overtime loss in Amherst.

Balise was the catalyst in the comeback effort, scoring five goals in the fourth quarter to force overtime. But Fairfield's Ryan Mulford scored the game-winner 36 seconds into the extra session for the win.

absolutely amazing, that last goal that Steph scored was just unbelievable," Brigandi said. "It was the best feeling in the world, we were going crazy jumping on each other and not letting up."

The Minutewomen had hoped to clinch the title on Friday when they faced Duquesne (9-8, 4-3 A-10) at McGuirk Stadium on the Minutewomen's Senior Day. It had the potential to be a storybook ending, but Duquesne's Katie Rekert scored the game-tying and game-winning goals in the overtime periods to shock UMass.

A mistake by goalkeeper Katie Florence set up Rekert's game-tying goal with three seconds left. Florence ran out of the net and grabbed the ball at midfield trying to run out the clock, but Rekert (three goals, one assist) stole the ball and hit a lob from 20 yards away to send the game into double overtime.

"We want Flo to be aggressive there, it should have never gotten to that point. But she's athletic, she picked up the ball and tried to clear it, and no one was there for her – it happens," Venechanos said.

Rekert then scored the winning goal with 1:04 remaining in the second overtime with a quick shot 15 feet from the goal.

After going into overtime tied at 12, the Minutewomen scored two goals in the first overtime, one by Danielle Pelletier, the other by Lyons (four goals, three assists), to give UMass a 14-12 lead with two minutes to go.

UMass had to rally in the first half to get in position for overtime. The Minutewomen trailed 5-1 after 15 minutes, before scoring six unanswered goals to go into halftime up 7-5, but neither team could assert its dominance in the second half.

Although all coaches hate losing, Venechanos talked about how playing in such an intense game could be good preparation for the A-10 Tournament.

"We can learn from it. We know what it is to be down, and then up and as a coaching staff we hope this will put us over [the top] next time," Venechanos said.

Jackie Lyons finished the regular season with a team-high 37 goals and 20 assists, helping lead the Minutewomen to a 5-1 record in the Atlantic 10. UMass clinched first place after Sunday's 15-14 win over St. Bonaventure.

Wild weekend results in regular season title

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

After falling one goal short of clinching the Atlantic 10 Championship against Duquesne Friday, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team sat in a circle wondering what might have been.

Some players wore a look of sadness, others confusion, and few more of anger. It was a painful loss, but the Minutewomen vowed not to let a second chance slip through their grasp on Sunday.

Two days after a 15-14 loss to Duquesne in sudden-death double overtime on Friday, the Minutewomen showed their resolve by overcoming a seven-goal deficit to clinch the A-10 regular season title with a 14-13 come-from-behind victory over St. Bonaventure.

UMass will play fourth-seeded George Washington Friday in the A-10 semifinals in Philadelphia.

"After losing on Friday we all went into this game [saying] there was no way we were going to lose this game," senior captain Holly Drown said following Sunday's win. "Until that final whistle we did not give up, it was amazing."

Trailing the Bonnies 11-4 with 20 minutes, 58 seconds left in the game, UMass (9-7, 6-1 A-10) went on a 10-2 run in the second half to win the game and the championship.

"In the first half they were beating us – they were one step faster than us and we were definitely scrambling," UMass coach Alexis Venechanos said. "We came for the last 20 minutes with a fire … it was a critical situation and everyone stepped up from there."

A great deal of the Minutewomen's second-half offense came from an unlikely source. Freshman Brittany Brigandi doubled her season total with a four-goal outburst (and an assist) against the Bonnies (7-10, 1-6 A-10), all of which came during UMass' crucial run.

Brigandi was a noted scorer during her high school career, racking up 249 career goals at Christian Brothers Academy in Syracuse, N.Y. Still, she had been a seldom-used reserve until Sunday, when Venechanos decided the team needed a spark.

"We needed to shake things up a little bit and Brittany came in and gave us a huge lift," Venechanos said.

After Brigandi's final goal cut the Bonnies lead to 13-11, UMass' leading scorer Jackie Lyons (57 points this season) scored back-to-back goals to tie the game with 4:11 left in regulation.

The victory gave the Minutewomen their first title since 2000 and assured them the No. 1 seed in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

First series sweep for UMass

Clegg, Serino dominant in convincing wins over Hawks

The Massachusetts baseball team finally did what teams have done to it all season.

Rallying back from a six-run deficit, junior outfielder Mike Donato hit a walk-off, two-run home run in the bottom of the 10th inning Sunday afternoon, propelling the Minutemen to an 11-9 victory over Saint Joseph's and the team's first three-game series sweep this season.

"We've been on the other end of that quite a few times, which isn't good, and it was great to see the table turn in our direction," said UMass coach Mike Stone, who has seen his team lose 10 one-run games.

UMass (14-19, 7-8 A-10) is in the midst of a four-game winning streak, after falling to Northeastern in the championship game of the Beanpot Tournament on April 13.

Donato made the Hawks pay, jumping on a pitch from SJU pitcher Ryan Kemp and drove it over the left field wall, ending the game and completing the weekend sweep.

"It's always positive when you feel good about what you are doing on the field and your efforts. We're seeing the results," Stone said.

The Minutemen pounded Hawks starter A.J. Holland early, scoring three runs in the first inning.

But reliever Matt Barnathan silenced the UMass bats, giving up two hits in 6-1/3 innings of work, while allowing St. Joe's to score the next nine runs of the game.

Clutch hitting in the eighth and ninth innings forced extra innings, which would eventually go the Minutemen's way.

Matt Gedman singled in pinch runner Peter Copa in the bottom of the ninth to tie the game.

In the series opener on Friday afternoon, senior left-hander Mitchell Clegg pitched his first career shutout, hurling a complete game – the first one complete-game shutout by a UMass pitcher since 2005.

Clegg allowed six hits, walked two batters and stuck out seven en route to Stone's 600th career victory.

"Mitchell has really turned things around. He has always had the talent to be a good pitcher but he has really committed himself this year and has seen results," Stone said.

As for the individual accolade that Stone received in winning the game, the coach of 27 years didn't see it as a big deal.

"That's not really that important as far as I'm concerned," Stone said. "What was important was that we went out and won the first game of the series, and that we swept."

Salato, HR record on collision course

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team always knew of Samantha Salato's power; it had just never been on display like it has this past week.

"We watch her hit all the time in practice and she just crushes the ball," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said after UMass' 7-0 victory over George Washington on Saturday.

Salato started this past week leading the No. 17 Minutewomen (27-6, 10 Atlantic 10) with seven home runs through 29 games. But in four games this week, UMass' clean-up hitter has doubled that total.

"The nice part about it is she is calm at the plate, she's not worried about it. She just wants to get a good swing on a good pitch," Sortino said.

The other nice thing for the Minutewomen is that the home runs are coming when they need them the most. In Friday's 3-2 victory over GW (13-28, 4-12 A-10), Salato started the scoring with a solo home run in the bottom of the fourth. The Colonials tied the game at two in the next half-inning but it was Salato who came through again.

In the bottom of the eighth with the game still knotted at two, Salato closed the game out. With two outs and facing a 2-2 count, she took the next pitch to center field to give UMass the victory.

"I'm not really thinking up there [at the plate]," Salato said after Saturday's game. "I'm just going up there not trying to hit home runs but they are coming."

Salato started the week with a two home-run performance against Providence on Tuesday. She first hit a three-run homer in the third inning followed by a solo home run in the fifth inning. The next day, as UMass blanked Boston University, 3-0, Salato hit her third home run of the week, a solo shot in the bottom of the sixth.

The final game of the weekend series with GW saw more of Salato's power as she slugged her sixth and seventh home runs of the week. The first came in the bottom of the first and the second drove in three runs as she hit one over the left field wall in the fifth.

The seven home runs this week give Salato a total of 14 on the season, one shy of Stacy Cullington's school record of 15, set in 2007.

As Sortino says when she speaks of her clean-up hitter, her power has always been there. But with the team constantly practicing its hitting, Salato has been able to get past any of her weaknesses.

"She is not pulling [her head] off of the ball, she's not yanking balls foul, which is what she has done in previous years," Sortino said. "Sam has always been powerful and her nemesis has been wasting all the good swings foul."

Salato said she is glad to see all of her practice paying off.

"We're just working on staying inside the ball and getting our rhythm down. We've been working on that all year, and I think it is finally starting to click," Salato said.

Streak lives on: 48 in a row

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

Every now and then, players are apt to go on certain streaks – whether it's a hitting streak where the batter just can't seem to falter at the plate, or a pitching groove where the hurler constantly hits their spots, making the hitter's job quite difficult.

Well, if there is such a thing as a "power streak," Samantha Salato is on it and the No. 17 Massachusetts softball team couldn't be more grateful.

Over the weekend, UMass hosted a two-game series against George Washington where the Minutewomen won both games, 3-2 and 7-0.

Coming into the series against GW, Salato led the team with 10 home runs – at least three ahead of any Minutewoman.

In just two games the junior left fielder launched four more, providing a great chunk of UMass' offense in the weekend's series.

"Sammy's been on fire in the last couple days," senior teammate Brandice Balschmiter said.

"You can really see what she does from the box – she's determined to get a hit, determined to do whatever it is to get the job done."

Salato led the Minutewomen (27-6, 10-0 Atlantic 10) in Friday's game with two home runs including a walk-off to straightaway center field over the scoreboard for the 3-2 win.

"Honestly, I just didn't want to go into another inning," Salato said after Friday's walk-off win. "[GW pitcher Amanda Gabriel] left a couple [pitches] hanging over the plate … she threw a couple changeups and I just waited for it and put a good swing on it. Thank God it went out."

Friday's contest also played witness to Balschmiter striking out a school-record 19 batters in eight innings. In Balschmiter's best outing of the season, the senior had all her pitches working for her, once striking out nine Colonials (12-17, 3-11 A-10) in a row.

"She was hitting her spots really well," catcher Jessica Serio said. "She was using a lot of moving pitches and they were doing what they were supposed to do.

"We didn't even realize it," Serio said of Balschmiter's record. "They're all numbers and the only number that matters is the number nf wins and she gets that for us."

Much like Serio, Balschmiter didn't realize her feat vastly approaching and didn't do much to acknowledge it after the game. The only thing that mattered to the senior is that the team picked up the victory.

Balschmiter made one mistake the whole day. A mistake, Balschmiter says, that had everything to do with where she put the ball.

"Basically, she didn't hit the ball, I hit her bat," Balschmiter said recalling her lone mistake – a two-run home run in the fifth inning. "Honestly though, the

UMass junior earns national award, $30K

Junior Joseph Sklut became the only student in Massachusetts to earn the Harry S. Truman Scholarship this year and the fourth ever from UMass.

One of 60 U.S. scholars to win

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts junior has been named one of 60 students from 55 American colleges and universities to win the Harry S. Truman Scholarship, a top honor for the country's undergraduates.

Joseph Sklut, a history major who is also in Commonwealth College, was chosen from 601 applicants for the award given out by the Harry S. Truman Scholarship Foundation.

According to a statement, the scholarship – which is based solely on merits – provides $30,000 to students to attend graduate or professional schools to prepare for a career in public service or government.

Recipients take part in leadership development programs and have special opportunities for internships and employment with the federal government. In return, they must commit to five to seven years of public service after graduate school, a statement said.

"[Winning the scholarship is] such a game-changing accomplishment," Sklut said in a telephone interview. "It opens so many doors and it's just really incredible and humbling that I could get it. I'm kind of flying high, I guess you could say."

He said he learned about the Truman Scholarship in June when he attended an information session held by the UMass Office of National Scholarship Advisement (ONSA), which assists eligible students to pursue nationally competitive scholarships and fellowships, according to its website.

Sklut, 21, said he sat down with ONSA employees when he returned

Administration rejects SGA suspension of The Minuteman

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Esther Terry rejected an enactment by the Student Government Association (SGA) that would suspend conservative campus newspaper The Minuteman in a letter to President Ngozi Mbawuike last week.

The letter, dated April 15, informed Mbawuike and the SGA that the enactment, which would suspend the registered student organization (RSO) the Silent Majority, which publishes the paper, did not bear Terry's signature.

"As the enactment does not reflect an appreciation of the Silent Majority's constitutional right to the exercise of free speech, I reject it altogether and recommend that it be rescinded in its entirety," Terry wrote.

University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said the University found that the enactment was "inappropriate, and did not conform to the value of protecting free speech on campus."

The enactment was filed as a motion by speaker Shaun Robinson on Tuesday, April 7, and accused the Silent Majority of committing "slander" against SGA member Vanessa Snow, whom The Minuteman had personally attacked.

"It's quite simple that in my understanding of what slander is that The Minuteman crossed the border from opinion to slander," he said.

Robinson said that members of the Silent Majority were not invited to the meeting because the motion did not require immediate action.

The Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), a civil liberties group, took issue with the SGA's enactment, in light of an incident at the April 1 "Rally for Free Speech," which the Silent Majority co-sponsored. A video surfaced on the Internet which showed Snow and

Orchard Hill senator Ben Thompson taking newspapers from the hands of a member of The Silent Majority.

Blaguszewski said that University police have looked into the matter.

"UMass police have reached the conclusion that there is no basis to seek a criminal complaint," he said.

FIRE spokesman Adam Kissell calls that incident and the enactment voted in by the SGA a "direct violation" of a number of basic rights. FIRE has written numerous letters to Chancellor Robert C. Holub urging him to come to The Minuteman's defense.

The following week, commuter senator Derek Khanna filed a motion to redact the bill, citing FIRE's letter, which would mandate a full-page ad in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian and the return of $1,500 – the estimated value of newspapers stolen – to the Silent Majority.

Speaker Robinson declined to entertain Khanna's motion, "and Khanna refused to give up the floor until the bill was heard. Robinson called the police and Khanna was asked to leave.

Robinson said the SGA was not in a position to repeal the bill, as per its bylaws, Khanna disagreed.

"If the SGA has passed the bill, it certainly can repeal it," he said in an interview afterward.

Blaguszewski said the administration has the authority to reject certain bills, called enactments, if they aren't in accordance with University policy.

Locals speak on recent journey to Gaza Strip

NoHo residents assess region's health issues

By Kat Manser
Collegian Staff

Over 35 people witnessed an inside glimpse of the intense destruction in the Gaza Strip, as speakers recounted a recent visit to the area at the Edwards Church basement in Northampton on April 16.

Northampton resident Paki Wieland and Springfield, Mass., physician Marty Nathan shared their experiences after they spent two weeks in March visiting the Gaza Strip with the Gaza Medical/Mental Health Delegation.

The delegation was the first independent international group to enter the war zone after the Israeli ceasefire following a 22-day war, which began in December, ended in January and killed 1,300 Gazans and 13 Israelis.

According to BBC News, the Gaza Strip is an area of land that shares borders with Egypt and Israel and was defined after the creation of Israel in 1948. It is home to more than 1.5 million Palestinians, most of whom live in the eight large refugee camps their families moved to after leaving their land during the creation of Israel in 1948.

The area was under Israeli control since the 1967 Arab-Israeli war, explains the BBC, but in 2005 Israel removed its occupying troops. Israel maintained a blockade over most of Gaza's borders, restricting entry in and out of the country. The Islamist militant group Hamas, who won the January 2006 election, took over the strip in June 2007.

The Israeli government has said its blockade of Gaza's borders, according to the BBC, and its attacks on Gazan soil are meant to "isolate Hamas and to pressure it to stop militant rocket fire."

When Wieland and Nathan traveled with doctors, activists and humanitarian aid to the area in March 2009, they explained, "We got to the border and we were told 'You cannot come in.' But we packed up our stuff and decided we weren't going back. We stayed there until the officials let us in."

The delegation slept on the floor of a concession stand near the border, whose owner gave them the key and said they could take whatever they needed. Wieland and Nathan explained that when they explained to people who they were, they were "thanked profusely for being there."

While there, they met Italian doctors who had been waiting at the border for three weeks until they were finally let in with Nathan, Wieland and the delegation. An audience member observed that the patients had also been waiting three weeks inside of Gaza for medical care.

Wieland and Nathan recalled meeting with a father whose two sons had both been killed.

"They faced a senseless loss of their children. Their sons' car was stopped by Israeli officials, and they were told to drop to the ground and not look up," they said. "One son did and was shot instantly. The other was shot in the leg. The father told him it was not a serious injury, that he would be fine. The son later died in his father's arms because no ambulance was let in."

Nathan recalled that when they were leaving Gaza,

Blagojevich's request to leave country denied

Former Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich is pulled away from reporters by his attorney as they leave the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse on Tuesday.

Reality TV appearance on hold

By Jeff Coen
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — A federal judge Tuesday denied permission to former Gov. Illinois Rod Blagojevich to travel to Costa Rica to participate in a reality TV show.

U.S. District Court Judge James Zagel called modifying the terms of Blagojevich's bail on political corruption charges "a bad idea."

Prosecutors voiced fears that the indicted ex-governor might flee if allowed to go to Costa Rica, noting that he faces 25 to 30 years in prison if convicted.

Blagojevich attorney Sheldon Sorosky said television show producer NBC was willing to pay for two security guards to watch Blagojevich around the clock. But Zagel noted that such personal monitors would have no authority to arrest him. He also said Blagojevich needs to stick around to read the government's evidence, because only then will he be able to understand the jeopardy he is in.

Zagel added that he was sympathetic to Blagojevich's financial condition, but said there were others ways for him to earn money.

Outside court, after the hearing, Blagojevich told swarming reporters: "This is another day in the big city. I know what the truth is when it concerns me, and I know that I've done absolutely nothing wrong. ... I'm actually looking forward to this day in court...I want to prove my innocence, I want to vindicate myself."

He stopped several times to greet non-media onlookers and curiosity seekers.

"I didn't let you down," he said to one woman.

"Want to get on TV? Come on in!" he yelled at another man.

Asked by a reporter how active he will be legally in his own defense, the former governor replied: "I'm going to be very active. I know a lot of things about me."

Before Tuesday morning's hearing, as he arrived at the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse, Blagojevich said participating in the reality show would be "a way to earn a living and support my children."

"It's not my first choice, but it's a living," he said.

Asked later if his client was really broke, Sorosky said: "It shows he is an honest man."

Blagojevich's lawyers had asked permission for their client to travel to Costa Rica in June to be a contestant on NBC's "I'm a Celebrity...Get me Out of Here!" They said he could have made up to $123,250 on the 12-episode show if not voted off by viewers.

In a short-lived 2003 version of the show, contestants, among other things, had to put insects, worms and rats in their pants, sit in a tank of leeches and wade through a swamp populated by snakes and eels.

Blagojevich also is seeking the court's OK to use more than $2 million in his campaign fund to pay for his legal expenses. Zagel encouraged his attorneys to file a motion to that effect but said he believed Blagojevich should be allowed to do so. A hearing on that issue was set for May 1.

Cheap pens write right

By Frank Greve
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Disposable pens used to be things you wanted to dispose of by throwing them across the room.

They skipped. They had to be muscled across the page. They leaked sticky ink that smeared good words – and shirt cuffs if the writer was left-handed.

Sometimes America progresses, however, and it has, thanks to generations of Japanese engineers driven by dreams of better pens.

"It's getting so that all of the pens that I get leave a very nice, deep, black line with instant starting and no globs or drips left behind," reports Dave Bengston, the founder of the website "Cheap Pen Review."

Among retractable pens, he lauds Pilot's G2 and the uni-ball 207 for writing ease; among capped pens, the uni-ball Vision Needle. In multi-packs, all cost less than $2 each.

The Vision even gets grudgingly good reviews from Chuck Edwards, the pen doctor at Fahrney's Pens in Washington, an emporium that is to high-end fountain pens what Tiffany is to diamonds.

"They write well, they hold a lot of ink, and they don't cost a lot," Edwards conceded.

The snugly capped Vision will even survive a washer-dryer ordeal without leaking and, when the cap's off, lay down ink smoothly enough to make a shy man glib.

The ink was a big challenge, explained Leighton Davies-Smith, the vice president of research and development for writing implements at Newell Rubbermaid, whose Sanford division markets uni-ball pens.

To prevent leaks, old-time ballpoint pen ink was nearly as thick as mayonnaise, said Davies-Smith. So the pen moved grudgingly. Ink tended to build up on the housing around the ball and then smear as the writer wrote.

Ink in many of today's roller ball pens is more than a thousand times thinner, and nearly as fluid as water, according to Davies-Smith. Words on paper flow accordingly. "The downside is, the ink is just a leak waiting to happen."

That's where the engineering comes in. To inhibit leakage, some pens hold the ink in their barrels with a fibrous absorber somewhat like a cigarette filter. Others, like the Vision, let the ink slosh around in the barrel and control leaks in other ways.

The Vision's spring-loaded cap, which form-fits the pen's tip, for example, is why the pen survives when it mistakenly ends up in the laundry. The cap and a seepage control system in the pen's nib also enable it to withstand cabin pressure fluctuations in airplanes.

The roller-ball at the tip, whose job Davies-Smith describes as "dragging a puddle of ink around on the paper," is made of very smooth tungsten carbide. It rolls as fast as a jotter can jot, which turns out to be about 2,500 ball rotations a minute, he said.

The more fluid the ball's movement, the less likely the ink is to pool – and the less a writer needs to squeeze the pen or press down on it. The same fluidity characterizes pens whose ink is a gel. Unlike fountain pens, which must be filled frequently, roller ball pens can write for a mile or longer, according to Robert Silberman, Pilot's vice president for marketing.

He insists that Pilot's disposable pens "write as well as anybody else's, right up to five-hundred and thousand-dollar pens."

Talk focuses on Gaza aftermath

there was a woman with all her papers, wailing and begging to be let in, but the Israeli officials were refusing.

An Israeli-American professor, Yoav Elinevsky, who is a co-founder of the Faculty for Israeli-Palestinian Peace, also spoke on the conflict and explained the difficult situation facing the refugees, calling their camps, "the biggest jail in the world."

"The poverty is not something we can understand; there is no electricity, no running water and immense overcrowding," he said.Elinevsky explained that the refugees left their homes to go to the camps because, "When the bombs are falling, a person leaves and hopes to return."

However, Wieland and Nathan said that only one bag of concrete had passed the border before they entered in March through tunnels built under the border, which is how supplies enter the country.

"There is no way to reconstruct when you cannot get even the most basic things into [Gaza]."

And the destruction does not end with physical and infrastructure damage. Wieland and Nathan informed the audience that Dr. Eyad Saraj, a psychiatrist at the renowned Gaza Mental Health Center, told them that at least 98 percent of the people in Gaza were suffering from traumatic stress, and there has even been some indication of an increase in domestic violence.

"While [the 22-day war] was certainly an outburst of violence, it is part of a war that has been going on non-stop for 60 years," Elinevsky said.

He urged the public to realize that, "unless we deal with the refugees with dignity and humanity, there will be no resolution."He also said that the U.S. is "heavily involved" with supporting the Israeli operation in Gaza, and that it is the public's responsibility to realize this and boycott corporations that benefit from the killing in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

During the question-and-answer session that followed the event, one community member brought up the Qassam rockets launched by Hamas at Israeli interests, which some believe provoked the Israeli strike on Gaza.

"You cannot mention Gaza without talking about the Hamas rockets, but the vast number of people being killed before the Hamas rockets started flying were Palestinians that had nothing to do with the rockets," said Nathan. "You have to understand the hunger, the cold and the 60 years before in order to understand those rockets."

Wieland and Nathan said they hope their presence in Gaza "let the people know there is a difference between the U.S. government and its people. The people of Palestine cannot go to the world. By [our] going there, the world is coming to them. We are letting them know we have not forgotten about them."

Wieland explained that when it was time to go home, although they were leaving behind a devastated Gaza with much work to be done, "we were ready to leave triumphant and happy and more committed than ever to do what we can to fulfill the dreams of the Gazans for justice."

to campus in September, and they began working on his application, which was due in February.

He found out on March 24 that he was one of the recipients, though it happened in a rather nerve-racking way.

Priscilla Clarkson, the dean of Commonwealth College, and Susan Whitbourne, a UMass psychology professor and the director of ONSA, called Sklut down to the office. They told him he never completed his application and started berating him, asking questions like, "Why have you insulted the school?"

Sklut became very worried and wondered what he could have done wrong.

"They all looked at me and then they said, 'You're not very astute, are you?' and I was like, 'What do you mean I'm not very astute?' and then they had me turn around and there was this huge sign that said 'Congratulations' and I was like, 'Oh my God,'" he recalled. "They had told the chancellor and the chancellor came in and talked to me – so it was pretty cool."

Two days later the results were posted on the Truman Scholarship Foundation's website.

"It's just really super. They only awarded 60 this year...I think the highest I ever knew of was 77," said Whitbourne, the director of the ONSA. "So, it's getting harder to win and more people apply."

Each student vying for a Truman Scholarship submitted a 10-page application, including a 200-word policy statement on a major social problem. About 190 finalists were selected for interviews and defended their policy statements to a panel of judges.

In his policy statement, Sklut proposed expanding the U.S. State Department in order to extend America's "soft power" around the world.

He and five other finalists from schools in the Commonwealth defended their statements during an all-day session at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology on March 11. He was the only Truman Scholar from a Massachusetts college this year and is the fourth UMass Amherst student to ever receive it.

Sklut's policy statement was one of great interest to him, as he is a history major currently in the Massachusetts Air National Guard. He is in his third year as a senior airman with the 102nd Intelligence Wing based at Otis Air National Guard Base on Cape Cod, according to a University statement.

He said he has been in the armed forces for three and a half years, including a two-year stint in active duty attached to an Air Force unit in Langley, Va.

He is a junior because he took one semester off to work for U.S. Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.) in his Boston office and another to go to Texas for six months to train with the Air National Guard.

Sklut said he is applying to such graduate schools as Harvard, Princeton, Georgetown and possibly the University of Chicago. He said he wants to get his master's degree in international relations or foreign service and then work for State Department, serving overseas with a diplomat.

Sklut's dedication to his country and his schoolwork has won him the respect of his teachers.

"He's probably one of the sharpest students I've met since I've been doing honors seminars," said Larry Owens, a UMass history professor who had Sklut as a student in his computer science traditions seminar. "And he writes smartly, which in this day and age, that's not to be taken lightly or for granted. So, he was a real pleasure to have in that seminar."

According to the Harry S. Truman Scholarship Foundation, the honor first awarded in the 1977-78 academic year is funded by Congress and serves as a living memorial to the former president, who had a passion for education and public service.

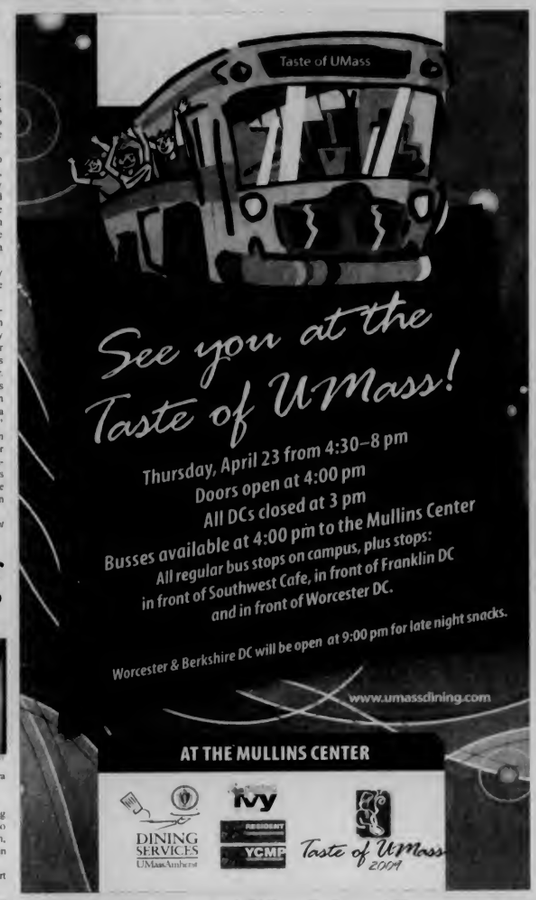
B.U. med student charged for murder in 'Craigslist killing'

By Ellie Choi
The Daily Free Press, B.U.

A Boston University student was arrested and charged Monday evening with the murder of a 26-year-old masseuse, as well as the separate armed robbery and kidnapping of another woman.

Philip Markoff, a second-year student at the BU School of Medicine, was taken into custody Monday afternoon and formally charged that evening for the April 14 murder of Julia Brisman at the Copley Marriott Hotel and the April 10 armed robbery and kidnapping of another victim at the Westin Copley Place, according to the Boston Police Department blog.

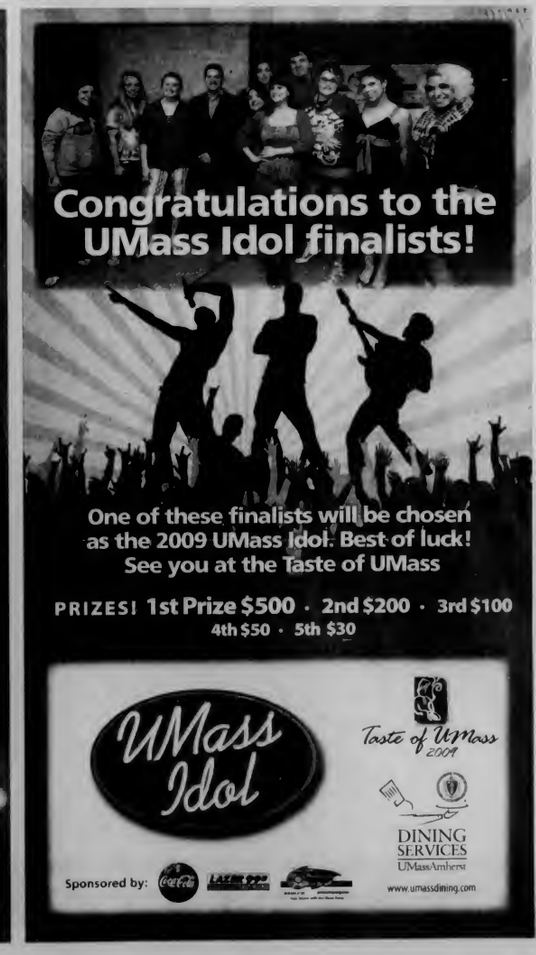
Brisman, the murder victim, was advertised as a masseuse on Craigslist, and the robbery victim was advertised as a prostitute on the same website.



BU officials suspended Markoff immediately upon hearing of the charges against him, BU Medical Campus spokeswoman Ellen Berlin said.

Black and white surveillance photographs from the two hotels led police to identify Markoff as a suspect, according to articles in The Boston Globe. His attire in the pictures also matched the description provided by a third potential victim, a prostitute, who claimed she was assaulted at the Holiday Inn Express Hotel and Suites in Warwick, R.I. April 16.

Markoff will be arraigned at the Boston Municipal Court Tuesday morning, BPD spokesman Eddy Chrispin said.



Police believe this man, caught on surveillance camera in the Copley Marriott Hotel, is Philip Markoff.

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

Racism that isn't racism

For the life of me, I can't seem to figure out the reason some people act so politically correct. Whatever the context of the situation, it only takes one person being uber-p.c. to slow almost any meaningful conversation to a dead stop. But it always seemed like one or more people being annoyingly politically correct was just that: annoying. I never really thought being p.c. could be realistically socially detrimental. I was wrong.

Dave Coffey

Recently, I randomly stumbled upon a broadcast news clip on Aparchive.com. The news clip was centered around an apparently "controversial" incident that occurred on a show called Tempe Street Beat, where a camera crew follows cops in Tempe, Ariz.

The controversy surrounded a routine traffic stop for a littering violation. During the clip, officer Chuck Schoville (who is white) pulled over a car with two men (both of whom are black) in it. Like any normal stop, the cop goes through all the routines, and writes the driver a ticket for littering.

Then, in a lighthearted gesture, Schoville tells the two men that he'll rip up the ticket "if the two of you just do a little rap." So the men, obviously not wanting a ticket, happily start rapping, noticeably amused by the situation.

But I fail to see how the situation at hand falls into a category with those things. It's one thing if a white cop is trying to hurt black people, but in this situation, a white cop is flat out helping two black men.

Obviously, the "community leaders" who were "outraged" thought that the cop only asked the men to rap because they were black, which they deemed degrading. In my opinion, there's two reasons why this is a bad mindset.

First of all, the people who were outraged at this whole thing assumed that the cop asked the two men to rap based on the fact that they were black, which is too broad an assumption.

One of the first things I noticed when I watched the video (which the cop probably also noted as well) was the way the guys were dressed. As simplifying as it may seem, they were dressed in a manner that suggested they might enjoy rap. And the way people dress is not a God-given racial trait. It's a choice made by anyone who wears clothes, and thus if someone wears clothes that represent a certain kind of culture, they choose to represent themselves that way. Therefore, if someone makes a snap judgment based on this, it isn't racial, nor is it outrageous.

Second of all, even assuming that the cop based his request for a rap on race, it's still not a racist sentiment.

Why are some people playing the race card because a white cop was being really nice to two black guys?

The officer rips up the ticket, the men drive off, and the incident is done with.

Actually, it would have been done with had the incident not been caught on camera. But because it was, everyone in Tempe saw the whole situation go down. According to the news clip, "...community leaders were outraged." The same community leaders then "demanded an apology" for the situation.

The first thing I asked was: what is everyone outraged about? Are there really so many politicians and "community leaders" out there who want to be Martin Luther King III so bad that they need to create "outrage" at a situation like this? Let's break down the situation in simple terms.

First, the guys in the car got caught littering, and got pulled over like everyone else – obviously no big deal. Second, the cop could have easily handed the men a citation for a couple hundred dollars. Instead, he let them get away with no ticket in a quick and easy manner in which they visibly enjoyed.

So, this is my question: why are some people playing the race card because a white cop was being really nice to two black guys?

I know there have been times where white cops have done awful, unjustifiable things to black people.

Racism is the belief that one's race is superior to all other races. In reality, the cop in this situation arguably showed admiration towards hip-hop, a musical genre that most would agree is a large part of modern African-American culture.

This, combined with the fact that he was actually relieving the men of the ticket, is by definition the opposite of racism. The only racist sentiment in the whole situation is actually that of the community leaders.

Their outrage stems from the fact that they assume the white cop wouldn't do this sort of thing if he pulled over a white driver, because they only discuss the impact on the black community. Therefore, they're essentially saying that if it happened to a white person, it either wouldn't be as "demeaning" or they wouldn't care.

Because of the fact that they would ignore the situation if it happened to a white person, they are obviously holding two different races to two different standards, which is racist.

This was a situation where being overtly p.c. was actually racism in disguise. I wonder if the guys who didn't get the ticket were as "outraged" as everyone else was.

Playing human, not God

Ben Moriarty

My best friend's father had cancer which is now in remission, and my mom's best friend has amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS). Both of these horrible diseases could very well be cured through stem cell research, which Obama pretended to get lots of federal funding for in March.

You think I'd be jumping up and down in joy. But I'm not, because honestly, I don't think I have ever jumped up and down – never mind in joy.

Also, I think federal funding and stem cell research is stupid.

And I'm still wondering why I would write a column about how I think stem cell and other research is stupid in spite of the "can see the benefits first hand" fact. More and more do I realize how I subconsciously drive everyone away. Now I know why my girlfriend dumped me.

The question isn't why one would be against stem cell research, but rather why one would be for it. There are the arguments against it. For example, the way they get stem cells is unethical because it destroys embryos, and since some think this is a human life, it is absolutely wrong.

Everyone has their own opinions on that matter – as do I – but people are going to think either it is a human or it isn't, and no person is going to persuade them otherwise.

So, to get to the root of the matter, are the benefits worth the money? Or is most research worth the money when realizing it could be better spent?

When we look at funding toward a lot of research in our country, it comes from the National Institutes of Health (NIH), who received over 10 billion from the bailout. On their website, they make their purpose clear: "NIH is the nation's medical research agency – making important medical discoveries that improve health and save lives."

We see the important part is to "improve health and save lives." Considering that even despite Obama's order in March, which states how federal money can start going towards it, the Dickey-Wicker amendment is still in effect, so the problem isn't yet exactly how much money will go into "controversial" stem cell research.

We do know, though, that after a decade of Dickey-Wicker, if it does get removed, there will most likely be hundreds of millions of dollars – if not billions – more going into this research.

If the purpose is to improve health and save lives, why don't we actually do that the best we can, instead of focusing on trying to extend some lives from 50 to 70?

If you don't think so, just look at the 10-year plans of New York and California: planning on investing $660 million and $3 billion into this area, respectively.

If the purpose is to improve health and save lives, why don't we actually do that the best we can, instead of focusing on trying to extend some lives from 50 to 70?

Just look at Haiti. According to UNICEF in 2007, the infant mortality rate was 57 (57 out of every 1,000 children die before the age of one) and the under-five mortality rate was 76. That is almost one out of 10 children dying before the age of five.

According to Haitianalysis.com, with only $30-$40 million, Haiti would be able to practically double its public health sector, including doctors and services.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services estimated, for the year 2008, the amount of money that was spent in specific areas. Aging had almost $2 billion spent on it, genetics had almost $7 billion, teenage pregnancy had $21 million, the tuberculosis vaccine had $18 million and the malaria vaccine had $32 million.

Can you see the correlation?

We have reached the point in our scientific knowledge where we can treat and delay most diseases for years. The majority of research being conducted now is not to improve life for all, but to improve some years of life for a select few, which turns out to be people who can pay for it and who live in a specific part of the world.

As one of my least-favorite Catholics, Nancy Pelosi, said, "We're saying science is [the] answer to our prayers." But what we are doing with our spending is research to extend some lives briefly when we already have enough scientific knowledge to live (and die) comfortably. Our research is the futile attempt to not deal with our own mortality at the expense of others. "We need science, science, science, science, science," Pelosi says.

No, we need love, love, love. And love consists in helping those who really need help, like the homeless, the poor in Haiti, the poor in Africa and all the people in the world who are malnourished, illiterate and can't receive basic healthcare.

Love isn't wasting trillions of dollars to get your old parents to live a few more years just to face a new health problem because you don't want to let them go.

It's time to stop playing God and start playing human. The hundreds of billions spent on research should go to those who have nothing, not something relatively extraordinary already.

A war on drugs is a war on freedom

John Glaser

The left has made another mistake with regards to Obama's presidency, assigning to him its greatest hopes for change in America, but unknowingly waiting for its own inevitable disappointment on yet another issue: the drug war.

No one failure in the Bush reign (although there were many) can hold a candle to the gigantic catastrophe that is the war on drugs, yet it remains one of the most cemented policies of the status quo. The number of raids that the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) performs on the homes and workplaces of otherwise innocent people is not slowing down. In fact, just two days after Barack Obama's inauguration, the DEA raided a medical marijuana dispensary in South Lake Tahoe, Calif., despite the state's explicit legalization of the use and selling of medical marijuana.

More people every day are arrested for possession of drugs than are arrested for aggravated assault, burglary, vandalism, forcible rape and murder combined.

It gets even crazier. We're at the point where a 13-year-old girl, an honors student, can be strip-searched in her school on suspicion of having ibuprofen (the equivalent of Advil), as the New York Times reported last month. Another middle school suspended a kid for having what they thought were drugs, but were really Skittles.

In Obama's town hall meeting in March, he rudely dismissed a question about the prospect of marijuana legalization by injecting a belittling joke to a laughing, ignorant crowd. This is, to say the least, unsurprising.

Our blatantly counterproductive drug policies only exacerbate the very problems they claim to be trying to address.

Despite our Draconian drug laws, the U.S. has the highest level of illegal cocaine and marijuana use out of 17 advanced countries included in a survey conducted about a year ago. Over 16 percent of Americans have used cocaine. The second highest usage rate was New Zealand, with 4.3 percent.

The established strategy of dealing with drug use has been an unquestionable failure, with hundreds of billions of dollars wasted and millions of lives ruined for engaging in victimless crimes of drug use.

Fortunately, a guiding light has been lent to the eyes and ears of America. In 2001, Portugal, facing similar evidence of failure in their fight against drugs and considerably higher rates of drug use than other similar countries, did something drastic – they decriminalized all drugs, including heroin and cocaine. Drug possession and use is still prohibited, but violations are dealt with entirely outside the realm of criminal prosecution. Instead, each case is managed administratively and in isolation.

The doomsayers in Portugal warned that this would lead to increases in drug use, crime and even predicted all of Portugal becoming a sort of drug fiend's haven. None of the horror stories were realized.

Portugal now has the lowest rates of drug use in all of the European Union, crime rates have decreased and there is a near-consensus about the resounding success of their decision to decriminalize drugs across the board. By virtually every empirical metric, conditions have improved. Nobody wants to return to the days of strict prohibition.

The fact that this kind of progress seems so impossible here in America is troubling. In truth, the notion of decriminalizing all drugs is not even considered among the potential avenues for our government to take, despite how much sense it makes.

Our blatantly counterproductive drug policies only exacerbate the very problems they claim to be trying to address.

It's almost hard to keep track of all the ways our ever-expanding, ever more powerful government is usurping our freedoms and destabilizing our standard of living. Outright rejection of the individual's right to consume any substance he or she chooses has become a customary banality.

But if we refuse to improve our approach to drugs through a civil liberties rationale, then we ought to at least submit to the overwhelming fact that our current approach has failed and that Portugal's has succeeded.

We should at least succumb to empirical data.

Alas, even the resilient progressive left has lent their undivided support to yet another leader, in a succession of dozens, who will maintain America's arrogant approach to managing social ills and predictably resist facts, evidence and the prospect of a truly free country.

Enabling support for siblings of the disabled

Matt Kushi

Life isn't always easy. Life is not a Hollywood script in which everything makes sense in the end. Sometimes things happen with neither rhyme nor reason. That is just the cold, harsh reality of the world in which we live. How do we continue on then? What is that driving force that allows us to open our eyes to the dawn of a new day? In two words: hope and support.

If you're an avid reader of my weekly column, you know where I stand on the issue of disabilities by reading my previous articles advocating for equal opportunities.

In the world of equal rights advocacy, the focus is rightfully on the individuals with the disabilities. However, that person's situation affects many around him or her. Being a sibling of a man with a disability, I can attest to that.

Just as war affects the whole family of a soldier, a disability affects the whole family of an individual. In these cases, siblings have been called the "forgotten" family members.

I would not quite say "forgotten," as that is simply not true, I would say, though, that siblings are the overlooked members of the family. This kind of situation can be confusing and cause turmoil in the life of any person, especially a sibling caught in the middle.

The individual with the disability becomes the focal point. The parents are the direct overseers, as it is their son or daughter. That leaves the sibling caught in the middle.

What usually happens is that the sibling either sacrifices attention given to them or physically sacrifices their time to aid their brother or sister.

It's a strange song and dance, as the neglect of the sibling is usually not intentional. However, that does not make it less frustrating at times.

My parents could not have done a better job of trying to share equal amounts of time to both my brother and me. However, sacrifices have still been made. There are times when my brother requires more attention, and that is the way that it should be. Sometimes, though, it does hurt when you don't see all of your loved ones at an event of yours. I have to remind myself that they would have come if they could have.

On an emotional level, it does grind on you. There are times when you must sacrifice what you want to do for the good of your family, and what your brother or sister is able to do.

Just as war affects the whole family of a soldier, a disability affects the whole family of an individual.

There are days when the perceived lack of attention makes you feel as though you are not good enough or are not cared about.

This latter case leads to the sibling trying to be a "perfect" child, so as not to upset the parents that already have enough on their plate. This can eventually lead to overcompensating in life and giving yourself the impossible task of being there for your sibling at all times when in reality, you cannot be.

Up to this point, you may be thinking that this is a pretty miserable life. I can tell you that it is not so. If you stick to the road and walk with your head held high and an open mind, you will be fine. It is possible to lead a "normal" life despite these unique circumstances.

This has been my life for all my 21 years. Do I understand it fully? No. Should I have gone to a support group when I was younger? Probably. But I have learned how to make the best out of the cards I have been dealt.

If I had any support to offer those who are in similar situations, it would be these tips:

1.) "Get education. The more you know, the better off you will be."

2.) "Live your own life."

3.) "Take care of yourself. Your parents and other family members may be stressed to handle your problems adequately. You may have to be prepared to stand on your own two feet and take more responsibility for yourself than others your age do."

4.) "Seek support. It's really important to talk to other people who are dealing with the same type of problems." To get more information on support groups, you can visit http://www.siblingsupport.org/sibshops.

If I were to add one final piece of advice, be proud of who you are and who your sibling is. Be proud of the amount of time that your parents invest in you and your sibling. No one said that life would be fair.

This is what was given to us, so don't hide behind the excuses. If you stay on the good road, hope and support will lead you to understand.

If there is anybody out there who feels the need to share their feelings on this matter, please e-mail me. Maybe I can help you, or maybe you can help me.

Everywoman tries to 'Take Back the Night'

By Nora Crocker
Collegian Correspondent

On April 23, the University of Massachusetts' Everywoman's Center will host the 2009 UMass "Take Back the Night," an event to speak out against sexual violence. Any person interested is welcome to take part in an art workshop, where participants can make their own activist art, march and rally.

The purpose of the event is to raise awareness about sexual violence and its prevalence on the UMass campus.

"It's really just like a rally to get people fired up and inspired," said Angela Bruns, a training and education specialist at the Everywoman's Center. "I think that we are all really capable of doing things in our daily lives that contribute to social change."

Bruns thinks it is important for the UMass community to come together and think about actions people, as individuals and as a community, can take to end sexual violence.

The Everywoman's Center's goal is to make people more aware of the ways to help end sexual violence and that speaking up is an important part of the process.

Allison Cross, an intern at the Everywoman's Center, said that some ways people can help are by "intervening in sexual harassment comments or just standing up for a joke that just doesn't sit right with you."

Bruns and Cross cite the recently released film, "Observe and Report," which depicts what they both consider to be a rape scene, as something people should speak up about.

"That's something that's mainstream; and that's something a lot of people are going to see; and they're going to think it's okay," said Cross.

Bruns said people can write letters to the producers or decide not to see certain movies as ways of speaking out against things that are "incredibly supportive of a rape culture."

"Take Back the Night" will emphasize art as activism and begin with a drop-in art workshop at 6 p.m. People will be able to create signs to use in the rally, t-shirts for the Five College Clothesline Project display and inspiring postcards that will become part of a travelling display at UMass.

Creating a t-shirt for the Five College Clothesline Project gives people affected by sexual violence the chance to express and share their personal experiences with the community. The postcards, which are for the EWC Postcard Project, can portray people's goals, passions, sources of inspiration or things they are proud of.

Bruns and Cross believe that art is a beneficial way for people to express themselves.

Some people can't always verbally say how they are feeling about something," said Cross.

They also note the ability of artists to display their work publically but remain anonymous – something ultimately therapeutic to the creator.

"We can create art that makes such a big statement and can be used to influence people and raise awareness," said Bruns, who also thinks art can be therapeutic. "The art can kind of help us to heal and to keep going."

The rally and march will begin at 7 p.m. on the lawn of the Student Union and will end with a drum circle led by Ellen Clegg, a local musician and educator. The rally will include performances by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players, Phallacies, Body Politics and Shira Erlichman, a poet, musician and activist from Boston.

"Take Back the Night" events have been taking place worldwide for several decades. Some believe the roots lie in 1877, when women protested the fear and violence they experienced after dark on the streets of London.

The Everywoman's Center is a resource located on campus that works to educate people about all forms of oppression and to assist victims and survivors of oppression. The center offers specialized training, workshops, counseling, support groups, events and online services.

Going to an event, such as "Take Back the Night," is an action that people can take to end sexual violence, said Bruns. "I want to let people know that we can all make a difference, even in little ways, we can make an impact."

"Take Back the Night" will take place on Thursday, April 23 on the Student Union lawn. At 6 p.m. there will be a drop-in art workshop, and at 7 p.m. there will be a rally and march. This event is free, open to the public, and wheelchair accessible. The rain location is Bartlett, room 61. For more information, contact the Everywoman's Center at (413) 545-0883 or www.umass.edu/ewc.

Fallon's a riot at the Calvin

Jimmy Fallon took the stage at the Calvin Theatre on Saturday with an improvised stand-up routine that included a few songs, crowd interactions and a slew of impersonations.

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, April 18, another comedian took the stage in Northampton. The latest "Late Night" host and former "Saturday Night Live" star Jimmy Fallon performed as the latest installment in the Calvin Comedy series.

The infamous venue has previously hosted such comedy greats as Bill Cosby, Mitch Hedberg and Adam Sandler, all of whom Fallon proceeded to impersonate during his set.

While the performance was not sold out, there was quite a significant turnout to watch the SNL alum.

Opening for Fallon was Wayne Federman, whose act centered on his self-depreciating sense of humor. Funny at first, his pleas for the audience's pity grew stale after the first few jokes.

Federman does have a prestigious resume as a comedian, however. The Los Angeles local has been a regular on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno," and also earned his own Comedy Central special. Most recently, Federman snagged a role in Will Ferrell's latest film, "Step Brothers."

Over the course of the evening, the audience persistently mocked his fashion choices, a critique which he encouraged. His horizontal striped sweater vest was eventually ripped off in a fit of faux-exasperation after a disembodied voice proclaimed, "Worst vest, ever!"

In addition to jabs at his own expense, the comedian included several original song snippets in his set. He accompanied these tunes with a keyboard, a skill that outshone his comedy repertoire.

Immediately after Federman, Fallon took to the stage with a naturally confident presence. Guitar in hand, he encouraged the cheers of his comedy groupies with the charisma of a rock star.

He began his set by performing his latest hit song, "Car Wash For Peace," which includes the heart-wrenching sentiment, "Christians, Muslims, Buddhists, Jews, c'mon all you Hindu dudes!/Let's have a car wash for peace."

Throughout the evening, Fallon covered varying topics – his upbringing, public showers and his experience as the new host of the "Late Show."

Drawing from his days on SNL, Fallon improvised a bit of the "Barry Gibb Talk Show," in which he interviewed an unwitting young man named Troy.

Unfortunately for Troy, his modesty in the dancing arena and willingness to divulge personal information made him the target of many jokes to follow. He and his girlfriend Emma, as well as their hometown of Hatfield, were favorite subjects of Fallon's from then on.

Some of the night's biggest laughs came from Fallon's original tunes, including "You Spit When You Talk" and "Idiot Boyfriend."

Fallon also performed his infamous conglomeration of 80s tunes, all sung to the beat of MC Hammer's "Can't Touch This."

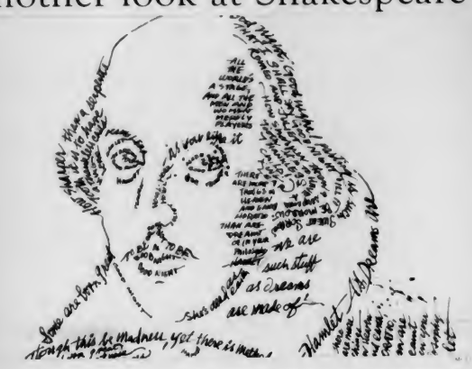
At one point during the evening, a member of the audience approached the stage and offered the comedian his jacket, unintelligibly revealing that, "My girlfriend thinks you are the most gorgeous creature on the planet."

While flattered by the drunken offering, Fallon did not accept the gesture, claiming he was not cold under the spotlights of the stage. He did, however, comment on the hospitality of the area.

Fallon closed out the evening by bringing Federman back out. The comedic duo took to their respective instruments and proceeded to break out some classic karaoke tunes.

Playing the stereotypical fan role, audience members yelled out for "Free Bird," which Fallon laughingly obliged. It became clear after the first few bars that he clearly lacked the rest of the lyrics, but soldiered on for the sake of comedy.

While it was nice to hear "Bohemian Rhapsody" performed with Fallon's skillful impersonations, the comedy of the situation seemed to be lost along the way.



The show had its fair share of funny moments, but would have been served best if Fallon had a clearer direction for his show.

While improvisation is one of the finest forms of comedy, one must at least have a jumping point from which to direct the humor. Thus, for the evening at least, Fallon's funniest moments came in the form of his better-known material. Even so, Fallon is a hard-working comedian, and clearly enjoys doing what he does.

The comic has matured significantly since his days on SNL, and has broadened his routines substantially. Somewhere amidst his guitar strings and satire lies a genuine showman.

Another look at Shakespeare

Shakespearian scholar Jonathan Bate speculates and tries to fill in the blanks of William Shakespeare's life in his new book "Soul of the Age: A Biography of the Mind of William Shakespeare."

By Tim Rutten
Los Angeles Times

Were Homer more proximate to us in time, perhaps we'd worry the details of his daily life as furiously as we do William Shakespeare's.

Perhaps – but probably not.

Homer, after all, wrote in Greek and, although Robert Fagles' and Richmond Lattimore's translations are everything a contemporary reader could want, their language is not the poet's.

Fascinating though they are, Homer's gods and heroes move through our consciousness as though beyond a scrim woven of more than physical distance; the greatest of them inhabit our reader's consciousness as idealized points of reference rather than relevance.

But Shakespeare is – Chaucer and the "Beowulf" poet notwithstanding – the very foundation of our canon. His language and rhythms, like those of the King James Bible, defined our first collective notions of eloquence. His characters and poet subjects speak to us as full-blooded individuals, complex, contradictory, heroic, flawed, grasping, foolish and wise, filled with longings we experience still. We see ourselves in them; each generation finds some compelling image of itself in the mirror of the Bard's vast oeuvre.

Jonathan Bate, professor of Shakespeare and Renaissance literature at the University of Warwick in England, is one of our most erudite Shakespeare scholars. His 1997 book, "The Genius of Shakespeare," makes an elegant case for its title.

His new book – "Soul of the Age: A Biography of the Mind of William Shakespeare" – explores the context and influences out of which that talent arose. The title is taken from the incantatory elegy with which Ben Jonson introduced the First Folio In 1613:

Soul of the age!

The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!

My Shakespeare, rise...

Bate, a governor of the Royal Shakespeare Company and co-editor of its 2007 edition of the complete works, brings not only a formidable command of scholarship on Elizabethan England but also the eye of a keen reader of the works that are the point of it all.

"Soul of the Age" is a series of linked essays divided into concise chapters. The best way to read this book is alongside the RSC compendium, because there's pleasure to be had by tracking Bate's quotations back to their textual context.

The author arranges his essays according to the "seven ages of man" set forth in Jaques' speech in "As You Like It": infant, schoolboy, lover, soldier, justice, pantaloon (the decrepit old man in traditional Commedia dell'Arte) and oblivion.

This architecture frees Bate from the constraints of chronology, and he uses that liberty to range across various social forces – including disease and sexuality – and political and intellectual influences that surrounded Shakespeare. There's fascinating speculation on which books might have been part of the library he plundered for stories and themes. Bate is a sober interpreter, but he's not afraid to suggest plausible novelty when the evidence seems to support it.

He speculates that during the "lost years" early in Shakespeare's life, he was enmeshed in legal cases that were a feature of the extremely litigious Elizabethan Age.

His name appears twice in a lawsuit over family property during the late 1580s, and he may have been present in 1588, when it was filed before the Queen's Bench in Westminster by the Shakespeares' lawyer, John Harborne. As Bate points out, Harborne read law at Clement's Inn: The character Justice Shallow in "Henry IV, Part 1" twice mentions studying there. Shakespeare appears to have borrowed the names of characters from people who figured in other litigation.

Bate is unimpressed and perhaps too quickly dismissive of recent scholarship claiming that Shakespeare – or, at least, his father – were "recusants," or secret Catholics.

He's daring in his strong suggestion that the famous mystery surrounding "Mr. W.H.," described in the publisher's preface to The Sonnets as "onlie begetter" of the poems, is simply a misprint. A careless printer, Bate proposes, made W.S. (William Shakespeare) W.H. and launched a thousand fancies.

Similarly, Bate pirouettes off diary notes by John Ward, vicar of Stratford, who wrote that "in his elder days (Shakespeare) lived at Stratford and supplied the stage with 2 plays every year."

Bate suggests that the Bard, who had invested in country properties, removed himself to Stratford for various reasons – including health – but continued sending completed plays to London theaters without "being involved in actually putting them on."

Shakespeareans will find other nuggets to argue about, but Bate is at his best when he applies his critical faculties to the plays' characters themselves. He finds, for example, a summary of Shakespeare's own complicated outlook and politics in his creation of the humorously detached but emotionally enmeshed Enoharbus in "Antony and Cleopatra."

"Shakespeare was a realist as well as a romantic, a skilled politician as well as a supreme poet," he writes. "He was equally capable of imagining Antony's dramatic trajectory as a rise and as a fall. He was perpetually both inside and outside the action, both an emotionally involved participant in the world he created and a wryly detached commentator on it. So he invented a new character, the only major player in the story who is absent from the historical source...Enobarbus might just be the closest Shakespeare came to a portrait of his own mind."

In discussing Shakespeare as lover and prudent family man, Bate says that "(o)f all Shakespeare's married couples, the pair who seem most intimate, whom the audience senses are as in love as man and wife as they were when first they wooed, are the Macbeths. That is a fact that may give pause for thought."

So does a great deal of this wide-ranging book, which is further evidence for another of the claims Jonson made in his elegy: "He was not of an age, but for all time."

Blum, Hayes, Pedrick lead UMass to victory

noon offensively for the Minutemen. Fairfield finally ended the UMass run and beat Schneider (14 saves) 13 seconds after Kell's goal. The Stags scored the game's final tally with 1:14 left off backup goalkeeper Mael Walkowiak.

It was a struggle offensively for UMass for much of the first half before it broke out in the third and fourth quarters. A number of turnovers and losses on the face-off made it difficult for the Minutemen to get into any offensive rhythm.

Hayes had a lot to do in solving that problem. With Joe Reale struggling mightily on the draw (3-for-14), Cannella inserted his junior midfielder to take the face-offs for the first time since his freshman season. It worked to perfection, with Hayes winning all four to spark the UMass offense.

"He scored a couple of big goals in the first half for us to put us ahead and then took a couple of big face-offs and had a couple of assists in the third quarter for us," Cannella said. "It was great to see him do that."

"We needed a little momentum there," said Hayes. "Fairfield's face-off guy [Steve Gotmont] was excellent – he was really controlling the momentum of the game. We couldn't really get the ball after we scored.

"I just told coach to let me try to take a face-off and it happened."

Fairfield freshman goalkeeper Charlie Cipriano, who started out strong, had little chance once UMass dominated possession. He finished with six saves in the loss.

It was a strong performance from the Minutemen, especially considering the short lay-off from Saturday's Georgetown game and the highly-anticipated meeting with defending national champion and second-ranked Syracuse on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

GAME NOTES

UMass has won 29 of its last 30 games when scoring at least 10 goals. ... The Minutemen scored 12 goals on just 24 shots. Fairfield took 40. ... The Minutemen has lost the face-off battle (14-8) nine times in 12 games this season. But they have won eight of those nine games, with the lone loss coming to Georgetown. ... UMass entered the game ranked 11th in RPI. ... Both goals by Balise came on the man-up, where UMass finished 2-for-2. The Stags were 0-for-5.

Injuries played a large factor this year for the the Minutewomen and coach Judy Dixon, but none were as big as the one to Magdalena Ploch. The freshman suffered from a bad back that sidelined her for seven games in which UMass went 2–5.

Injury-plagued year still success for UM

to do really well, and we have some other things happen."

Those "other things" happened to be substantial injuries this season. Senior Stephanie Stahlberg had to sit out the entire season, recovering from a broken elbow from a bicycle accident in the offseason. Boney also missed time this season, sitting out a match against a strong Boston College team. The most significant injury for UMass was the loss of Ploch with a bad back for seven matches, in which the Minutewomen went 2-5.

"The injuries were critical. When you have an injury to your No. 1 [Ploch], everyone has to move up," Dixon said. "When you lose someone in the bottom of the lineup, it doesn't affect you as much. But losing a player at the top as long as we lost ours, you don't come back from that well."

The season just ended, but Dixon said the team is already excited looking ahead to next year.

"We're losing three seniors but we're recruiting well. We're looking forward to next year and we have five out of the six players in the starting lineup back," Dixon said. "We're also adding players who could potentially fill in that No. 6 slot. Everyone is eager to start September."

Still, Dixon is not going to shove off the achievements her team accomplished this year.

"This team was unbelievable in terms of fighting hard and work ethic," Dixon said. "I know this team wishes they had more wins, but I'm satisfied with how the year turned out given the set of circumstances."

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"If absolute power corrupts absolutely, does absolute powerlessness make you pure?"
- Harry Shearer

Balance is the key. Balance is the key to many things. Do we understand balance? The word "balance" has seven letters. Seven is difficult to balance, but not impossible if we are able to divide. There are, of course, the pros and cons of division.

Midfield dominates over stagnant Stags

Minutemen 1 win away from ECAC title, NCAA berth

BY ELI ROSENWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Behind the usual suspects on offense and defense, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has enjoyed a resurgent season to put them within reach of an NCAA Tournament berth for the first time since 2006.

But on Tuesday afternoon, it was the forgotten midfield crew that came through leading UMass to a 12-6 victory over Fairfield in a key conference game that put the Minutemen one win away from claiming the ECAC title and an automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament.

| Fairfield | 6 |

The midfield group combined for seven goals, including three by senior Evan Blum for his first-career hat trick as the Minutemen scored seven unanswered goals in the second half to pull away from the Stags in Fairfield, Conn.

"This was almost like a playoff game for us," said midfielder Bobby Hayes, who had two goals and two assists. "It was a big win all-around. I'm just excited for the midfield to finally step up and take some pressure off the attack."

The victory also took some serious heat off the No. 16 Minutemen (8-4, 5-1 ECAC), who can lock up the league title and automatic NCAA qualifier with a win at Rutgers on May 2. A loss for Loyola at Hobart on April 25 would also suffice for UMass.

The Minutemen put themselves into that position with a win over the Stags (6-6, 3-3 ECAC) Tuesday. Leading just 5-4 after two early Fairfield goals in the third quarter, the midfielders – along with goalkeeper Doc Schneider – took over the game. Hayes, Blum and Rory Pedrick (two goals) guided UMass to seven straight goals over the next 22 minutes, 45 seconds while Schneider completely shut down the Stags.

Five different players scored during that decisive stretch to put the game well out of reach. That balance offensively was exactly what UMass had been missing as of late, especially in its 10-7 loss to Georgetown on Saturday.

"As much as you need your attack to score goals, we've struggled to score goals at the midfield, and today we had seven midfield goals out of the 12, which is obviously what we needed," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Guys are keying on Tim [Balise] and Jim [Connolly] and Evan, Bobby Hayes and Rory Pedrick stepped up."

But it's not as if the midfielders did it alone. Connolly and Balise each scored two goals, giving them a combined 55 goals on the season. Connolly scored his 30th goal of the year in the fourth quarter to extend the lead to 11-4 with 3:21 remaining.

Art Kell added another one 35 seconds later, capping the after-

UMass takes 6th at A-10s

Dixon earns 200th victory, looks forward to next season

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Holding its own in the Atlantic 10 Championships, the Massachusetts tennis team finished off its roller-coaster ride of a season this past weekend by giving coach Judy Dixon her 200th career win.

UMass entered the tournament Friday in Monroeville, Pa., seeded No. 6 with a first-round matchup against No. 11 Dayton.

The Minutewomen showed familiar flashes of dominance seen in the regular season, defeating the Flyers (10-10) 5-0. UMass earned the doubles point and then took the No. 1 through No. 4 singles for the lopsided victory, putting coach Judy Dixon just one win shy of the 200th of her career.

With the win, UMass advanced to the quarterfinals with a looming second-round match against No. 3 Xavier later that day.

Though the Minutewomen fared well against the Musketeers (17-9) in previous years, winning two of three in A-10 Tournament play and holding a 5-3 overall record, they struggled to win a match on the day.

Xavier won two of three in doubles and three singles matches to seize the 4-0 win. UMass was two points away from a win at No. 1 doubles and in the midst of three competitive singles matches when play was suspended with the final result already settled.

The loss ended UMass' hopes for claiming the tournament championship, put Dixon's milestone win on hold and set up a consolation match against No. 7 Duquesne.

The Minutewomen saw the highlight of their season come on Saturday afternoon when they earned an impressive victory against the Dukes (8-13), giving Dixon her much-sought 200th career win.

Duquesne took the first point of the match, clenching doubles victories at No. 1 and No. 2. UMass duo Candynce Boney and Lauren MacKay didn't allow a sweep, however, as they defeated Tara Majdalani and Stephanie Novakowski, 8-4 at No. 3 doubles.

In singles play, the Minutewomen rebounded by obtaining wins at No. 1, 2, 5 and 6. Boney, Magdalena Ploch and Maude Leeluyse all defeated their opponents, setting up a deciding match at No. 6 singles. Laura Danai played in one of her better matches on the season, topping Majdalani 6-1, 6-0, giving UMass the victory on the day.

Dixon was pleased to earn her 200th win, but enjoyed more the fact that it came this particular season.

"I was really glad that my 200th win came with this team as opposed to the beginning of next year. It was more meaningful that it came in this season against a very strong Duquesne opponent," Dixon said. "All it means is that I've had a long, fairly good career, but I'm proud that it came with this team."

After passing Duquesne, UMass took on No. 8 Saint Louis for fifth place in the consolation finals on Sunday.

The Minutewomen started off strong, taking two of three matches for the doubles point, but then fell just short in singles, winning only two of six matches. The victory placed the Billikens (13-11) at fifth place and dropped UMass to sixth overall in the A-10 Championships.

Though the Minutewomen didn't finish where they wanted to, Dixon isn't taking their result for granted.

"We held our seed. We had a very good win against Duquesne, which I was very happy about. We lost in a heartbreaking match against Saint Louis," Dixon said. "I'm satisfied. The kids put in a really good effort after a difficult year and performed well."

UMass ended its 2008-2009 season with a 2-4 record in the A-10 Tournament and an 11-15 overall record on the year.

Dixon said she had high hopes heading into the season, but she knows things don't always turn out as expected.

"Every year, you start out with one set of expectations, and then you're thrown different curveballs. This year, we had a lot of things happen that were out of our control," Dixon said. "Some years I feel like I don't know what's going to happen, and we do very well. And some years, I feel we're going

UMass coach Judy Dixon won her 200th career match over the weekend as the Minutewomen defeated Duquesne in the A-10 Tournament.

Freshman Magdalena Ploch and the Minutewomen pulled off victories against Dayton and Duquesne to finish sixth in the A-10 Championships.

UMass reclaimed the title of Atlantic 10 Champions after losing its first ever conference championship to Rhode Island last season. In the 14 years since the first ever A-10 Championship, UMass has won all but one.

Minutewomen win 13th A-10 Championship in 14 years

Richten, Burrill, Kelly earn A-10 First Team

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The number 13 is often associated with bad luck. For the fairly dominant program that earned the golden number in conference titles this past weekend, it was more about hard work and restoring tradition.

On Saturday in Pennsauken, N.J., the Massachusetts rowing team captured its 13th Atlantic 10 Championship. The Minutewomen have emerged victorious in 13 of 14 A-10 Championships.

"It was kind of a validation for all the hard work and long hours that these girls put in all year," said senior co-captain, Molly Morgan.

The 2009 path to the prominence was different from the one traveled by past rowing teams, as the Minutewomen had to take the title from 2008 A-10 Champions, Rhode Island. UMass coach Jim Dietz expressed that his team did not simply accept the challenge this season but embraced it.

"That's what they've talked about all year," Dietz said. "Taking back the title."

It took an entire team effort to do just that, as the Minutewomen were able to rack up a total of 141 points, 24 more than the second-place Lady Rams. Saint Joseph's had a strong showing as they rounded out the top three, earning 110 points. Senior Captain Airlina Burrill expressed how fulfilling it was for the entire program to bring yet another A-10 title back to UMass.

"UMass rowing is just so much bigger than the current team. It was good to win, because it means so much for past women who have come through the program," said Burrill.

The Minutewomen were able to take the lead in the third event of the day, when the second varsity eight placed first with a time of 6:58.3. The youth of the Minutewomen was also heavily on display on Saturday. The novice eight, novice four and lightweight four were all able to win their races in impressive fashion. They recorded times of 6:58.5, 8:23.3 and 7:51.9, respectively.

Senior Haley Fitzgerald described the performance on Saturday as one marked by determination, as the team did not want to end the day with the same feeling in their stomachs as they did last year.

"I think every boat took it as a personal mission to do their part to help win the race," said Fitzgerald.

After the races, which concluded around 1 p.m., all the teams ate together, as the conference accolades were awarded. In doing so, they named the first and second team All-Conference members, which included four Minutewomen. Freshman Julia Richter made the first team, as well as seniors Airlina Burrill and Erin Kelly. Freshman Amanda Doolan was named to the All-Conference second team.

Although the fight for conference supremacy is over, the Minutewomen's season is far from being over. The team heads to Boston this Saturday to take on MIT.

Renewal in question for southern Vt. nuclear power plant

The Vermont Yankee power plant lies on the Connecticut River, less than 37 miles from Amherst. It is one of the oldest plants in the country.

BY LORAINE BURGER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the oldest nuclear power plants in the country faces opposition as its license to operate comes closer to expiration.

Vermont Yankee is a single reactor plant that is sufficient to power 500,000 homes. It is the only plant in the state, and its operating license was issued in February 1973.

The Yankee Nuclear Power plant in Vernon, Vt., sits on the Connecticut River, less than 37 miles north of Amherst. It produces one-third of the electricity for the state of Vermont, and is one of the oldest plants in the country, having been operated since 1972. The license expires in March 2012, but its owners, Entergy Nuclear, are requesting a 20-year license renewal.

But many activists and some residents in the area are opposed to the license renewal. In small towns across the state, town meetings have held votes on the issue, and the Vermont Yankee Decommissioning Alliance (VYDA) is holding rallies to keep the plant from operating beyond 2012.

Safety is one of the biggest concerns for extending the plant's use, but the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) continues to add safety requirements for the plant to continue functioning.

"The license would be renewed until 2032," said Larry Smith, manager of communications at Entergy Nuclear. "We need to insure that it would be operated for another 20 years as safely as the first 40 years."

But one activist disagrees.

"Its party politics," said Debra Stoleroff, volunteer of VYDA, regarding the slow decision from NRC. "The Vermont legislature took the power to decide to give [Entergy] a certificate of public good, which needs research and assessments."

The further the research goes, the longer Vermont waits for a decision. Assessments have been both public and private, and according to Stoleroff, it is Entergy that is delaying the decision.

"Entergy hasn't given the state a rate yet for how much they will charge for power," said Stoleroff.

Students waste tons of food

Dining Services looks toward new solution

Between all four dining commons on campus, more than 310 tons of food were wasted in the spring of 2008. New measures put in place by Dining Services hope to drastically reduce that amount.

BY ISABEL GONZALEZ
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

At the University of Massachusetts, a student wastes around five or six ounces of food per visit to the dining commons. In spring 2008, more than 310 tons of food was wasted at the four UMass dining commons, according to Ken Toong, director of UMass Dining Services.

"I think it's appalling the amount of food that is wasted," said Jane Williams, newly appointed purchasing manager and sustainability officer at UMass.

UMass is part of a larger trend of food waste. Americans waste an estimated 27 percent of food available for consumption, according to recent a New York Times article. This accounts for the food wasted in restaurants, supermarkets, cafeterias and home kitchens at a time when food prices are increasing and food shortages are occurring around the world.

The New York Times also reported that according to an Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) study, Americans generate an estimated 30 million tons of food waste each year, 12 percent of the total waste stream.

In response to the growing problem UMass is doing away with trays this fall to make students think twice about food consumption. Toong says that the amount of wastage has decreased one ounce per student in the past year. But with the new "tray-less" policy next semester, he hopes to go one step further.

"We really encourage the students to just take what they can eat," said Toong.

One reason students waste so much food is that there is so much of it. UMass Dining Services serves up to 5 million meals a year, and students have access to a variety of food with just one swipe of their UCard. With so many different kinds of food at their fingertips, students tend to take a lot more food than they end up eating.

"I have friends who grab so much food when we go to the D.C.," said Ines Mejia, a sophomore. "They see something they want and they grab it. But then they see two other things they might want, so they grab that as

UM gains access to Yahoo! supercomputer

BY CAMERON J. FORD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Yahoo!, Inc. has recently announced a bolstered partnership with four major research universities, including the University of Massachusetts.

The partnership will work to advance a research-gathering process called "cloud computing." Other universities included in this partnership are University of California at Berkeley, Cornell University and Carnegie Mellon University.

Cloud-computing is a process that conducts research through the use of an archive of widely varied data known as a cloud-computing cluster. This cluster can contain hundreds of millions of archived web pages, scanned books and statistical data sets, among other sources. They are stored within a vast memory space to be available to researchers.

The cloud-computing supercomputer sorts through trillions of bytes of information, picking out the most relevant ones based on its search guidelines. Many companies other than Yahoo! own their own cloud-computing networks, such as IBM, Amazon, Google, Microsoft and Level 3 Communications.

The Yahoo! Cluster – dubbed "M45" after the Pleiades star cluster – that UMass has been granted full access to has been in operation since November 2007. With the capability to perform a stunning 27 trillion calculations per second, it enables users to sort through and process huge amounts of data with considerable speed.

"Cloud computing is becoming an important arena for researchers and developers to test next generation software services, and scalable software and systems is at the heart of providing cloud services via the Internet," according to a statement on Yahoo!'s academic relations website. The great cluster of information not only aids in gathering data for research projects, but also allows scientists and engineers to test their own data-gathering software.

In order to gain access to the M45 cluster, a university must submit a proposal to Yahoo!'s academic research division describing the proposed systems software and applications research they are hoping to perform on the cluster, as well as justification that cluster access is necessary to perform the proposed research project.

This is "to make sure the cluster works well and will support in a secure way the different organizations that will be using the system", according to Yahoo! Academic Relations.

"Our vision is to improve upon current technology through the processing of large data sets," said Jim Kurose, dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics. "Yahoo!'s supercomputing cluster will enable us to do data-intensive research on a large set of scanned books drawn from the Internet Archive's million-book collection. The latter includes 8.5 terabytes of text and half a petabyte of scanned images. Research on such large datasets would not be possible without the use of clusters like the one Yahoo! is offering us access to."

DREAM Act gains College Board support

BY HANNAH MCGOLDRICK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Development, Relief and Education for Alien Minors (DREAM) Act – which proposes to give undocumented students access to higher education – gained momentum this week after an endorsement by The College Board.

According to the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, an estimated one million people migrate to the United States every year, with 65,000 undocumented students graduating from high school each year.

Although these students were given the right to attend primary and secondary schools in the U.S., most are unable to go on to college and cannot legally work in this country without legal citizenship.

The DREAM Act is a bipartisan document that was originally introduced to Congress in 2001. A revised version of the Act was introduced to the Senate in March 2009.

The Act provides "undocumented immigrant youth in the United States with conditional residency and a pathway to citizenship provided they came here before the age of 16 and maintained continuous residence for five years, graduate from high school or obtain a G.E.D. attend two years of college or join the military and have no criminal records," according to dreamactivist.org.

The College Board came out this week with a motion of support stating that, "allowing more people to get more education is in America's best interests."

"The DREAM Act will provide opportunities for students who are already doing well and have proven themselves," said Jelisa Difo, a senior Social Though and Political Economy major at the University of Massachusetts, who believes that the DREAM Act will not just allow anyone citizenship.

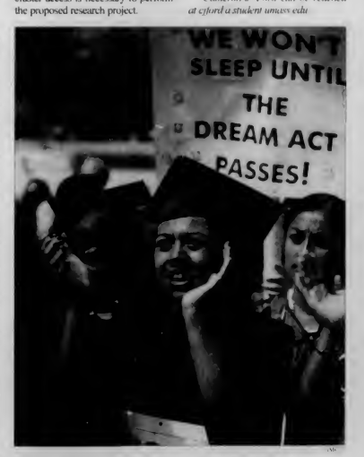
The DREAM Act was introduced by Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois and Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, as well as Rep. Howard Berman of California and Lincoln Diaz-Balart of Florida. In order for the Act to pass, 60 votes of approval by the U.S. Senate must be attained. Both Sen. Edward Kennedy and Sen. John Kerry have voted in favor of the Act.

"We must also enact the DREAM Act, which is included in the Senate bill. This bipartisan compromise will enable immigrant students to pursue higher education like citizens, or join the military, as many are eager to do," said Sen. Kennedy in a statement to the press.

"The DREAM Act is the right title, since the Act will give thousands of bright, hard-working immigrant students a chance to pursue their 'American Dream.' By denying them these opportunities, we deny our country their intelligence, their creativity, their energy, and often their loyalty," he said.

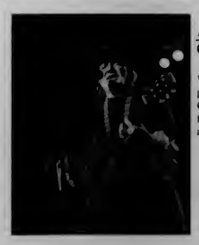
UMass senior and SGA commuter sen. Vanessa Snow said the issue is also one of public safety.

"Kids should be allowed to be in school and off of the streets," said Snow. "DREAM Act students will become working taxpayers and the United States will see a return



This return was noted in a 2006 study by the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation. The Foundation projected that Massachusetts would receive $2.5 million in tuition and fee payments from undocumented students enrolled in the state's public universities. It was projected that about 10 percent of these undocumented students would be enrolled at UMass.

This past March, a group of nine UMass SGA members lobbied for the DREAM Act at the 2009 U.S. Students Association Legislative Conference. Lindsay McCluskey, former SGA Student Trustee and Center for Educational Policy Advocacy (CEPA) member, said that the group lobbied 10 out of the 12 Massachusetts Congresspersons and talked to them about supporting the DREAM Act.



McCluskey said that CEPA and Massachusetts Students Uniting (MSU) are working with another statewide organization, the Student Immigrant Movement, to help the passage of SB 714, "an Act relative to equal higher education opportunity for all Massachusetts high school graduates." This Act will allow undocumented students in Massachusetts access to in-state tuition for the states' public universities.

"One thing about the DREAM Act is that many people are trying to make the DREAM Act about immigration," said McCluskey. "[But] the DREAM Act is about breaking down the barriers to access."

Students from around the country have been lobbying for the DREAM act since it was first introduced in 2001.

Researchers discover new PCB toxicity

BY ELAINE HSIA
THE CALIFORNIA AGGIE, UC-DAVIS

DAVIS, Calif. — Thirty years after PCBs (polychlorinated biphenyls) were banned in the U.S., University of California-Davis researchers have discovered how the class of toxic chemicals may cause behavioral disorders in some children, even at the low levels that people encounter now.

The series of three new studies together reveal that PCBs can disrupt cellular signals crucial for normal brain development and function.

Earlier studies linked PCBs to a range of neurological impairments such as autism, ADHD and seizure disorders.

The new studies provide a compelling explanation for this link and furthermore implicate the most abundant and least regulated PCBs — which were once thought to pose less threat to human health — as particularly harmful agents in the developing nervous system, the researchers said.

"Not all PCB forms will have this same effect, but the work represents a clear picture of the damage that these chemicals — and ones like it — can cause," said Thomas Zoeller, a biology professor at University of Massachusetts, Amherst who was not involved in the studies.

PCBs were used in a wide variety of products such as electronic components, pesticides and flame retardants. They do not easily degrade and substantial amounts persist in the environment, accumulating in the air and in fish that people consume from hotspots like Chicago and the Great Lakes.

In the first study, published in Environmental Health Perspectives, researchers simulated in animals the type of PCB exposure that children might have in order to find out how the chemicals alter the way brain neurons (cells) develop.

The researchers exposed rat pups in utero and during weaning by feeding mother rats a mixture of PCBs similar to those found in the environment. Compared to their untainted counterparts, pups that had low levels of PCB exposure exhibited slower learning curves in a water maze exercise designed to stimulate patterns of neural growth associated with learning and memory.

In brain regions affected by developmental disorders, PCBs altered the plasticity (shape) of neurons, as well as the changes in neural growth and plasticity typically observed with water maze training. The researchers also noticed higher levels and activity of calcium channels in neurons known as ryanodine receptors (RR), which generate electric signals that influence plasticity.

"We think, in part, it's because that the function of the RRs have been altered [by PCB exposure] over a long period of time [that we saw all these changes]," said Isaac Pessah, professor and chair of the department of molecular biosciences at the UC Davis School of Veterinary Medicine, who co-authored all three studies.

At higher doses, these effects are not seen because the PCBs trigger defensive mechanisms in the body that remove the chemicals before they reach the brain, he explained.

To get a clearer sense of the cause and effect relationship between PCBs and RR activity in the second study, which was published in Toxicology and Applied Pharmacology, the researchers exposed rat brain tissue slices to individual PCBs.

Although one was more potent than the other, both of the tested PCBs had excitatory effects on brain tissue at low doses, which could be dampened by adding a compound that blocks RR signaling.

Normal brain function depends on a fine balance between excitatory and inhibitory pathway signals in the nervous system, and we showed that PCBs can disrupt this balance through the RRs, Pessah explained.

"In kids with autism [and some other disorders], the inhibitory side seems to be not operating quite as well as it should be," he said. "So these kids tend to start out being somewhat imbalanced," a problem that can be intensified "... with compounds [like PCBs] that enhance the excitatory side preferentially over the inhibitory side."

The researchers sealed their conclusion with their third and newest study, which was published in Public Library of Science – Biology. They captured high resolution snapshots of PCB molecules directly interacting with RRs and locking the channels in the open active form, which account for the PCB effects seen in the first two studies.

Toong hopes to reduce food waste with trayless eating

well. It makes me wonder if they're actually going to eat all that food."

The University has tried taking different measures in the past to decrease the amount of food that students waste each year, like placing signs around the dining commons showing the amount of food UMass students waste each year.

"We try to educate our students on how we can better our environment for now and for the future," said Toong.

The Small Plate, Big Flavor Program teaches about portion control and using smaller plates. Instead of serving a five or six ounce piece of chicken, they now serve a three ounce piece of chicken. In a country where obesity is increasing, portion control can prevent waste and also bring a healthier approach to student dining.

The University will introduce a new approach to combat food waste next semester. UMass will officially become "tray-less" in the fall. Across the nation, many schools are trying this trend. Instead of grabbing a tray and stacking it up with multiples plates of food in one trip, students will have to get up and make multiple trips if they want more food. According to Toong, 20 percent of students already eat without trays.

"I don't know if going tray-less is actually going to work, but I guess we can try it and see if less food is actually wasted," said junior Jonathon Ureña.

UMass dining officials note there are a number of advantages to going tray-less. Not only does it decrease the amount of food students waste but also it saves time, energy and water wasted on washing the trays.

"I think we are quite ready for this," said Toong. "If it reduces food waste between five to 10 percent, I'll be happy."

Despite all the efforts, however, there is still wastage at the end of the day. Dining Services must predict the amount of food it has to make based on the time of day and the day of the week. Food that is put out on display must be thrown out to comply with rules of food safety.

UMass has a come up with another method of reducing this kind of food wastage. They don't make food until it's close to the time it's expected to be eaten. This provides students with fresher food and allows Dining Services to save any food that has not been consumed. Food that is not eaten can be frozen or used within 24 hours.

Besides reducing food waste, Dining Services is also looking for ways to keep food waste out of landfills. Composting is the biodegradation of organic matter, such as food waste, that produces a substance that can enhance soil. About 475 tons of food waste was collected at UMass and shipped to three local farms and turned into useable food compost in 2007. All four dining commons on the UMass campus compost food.

House begins work on new caps for greenhouse gas emissions

BY JULIET EILPERIN
THE WASHINGTON POST

WASHINGTON — The House Energy and Commerce Committee started work Wednesday on the nation's first-ever limit on greenhouse gas emissions, sparking an intense round of lobbying in Washington as interests on both sides of the debate sought to sway undecided lawmakers.

As lawmakers deliberated on the benefits and costs of placing a national cap on carbon-based emissions, electricity utility executives, environmental advocates and clean-tech entrepreneurs alike made their case both in front of the panel and behind the scenes. The intense effort – on the same day environmentalists across the country were commemorating Earth Day – underscored the uncertain fate facing the bill sponsored by the committee's chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., and Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., which would make ambitious cuts in greenhouse gases over the next four decades.

On Wednesday, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., raised the possibility that the final version of climate legislation would not be complete a year from now, a day after vowing the House would pass legislation "this year."

"It is my commitment that by the time we observe the 40th Earth Day next year, that we will have made substantial progress toward energy independence, reducing our dependence on fossil fuels and ... reversing the climate crisis," Pelosi told reporters at a gathering hosted by the Christian Science Monitor.

Pelosi's remarks reflected the fact that many senators, including roughly a dozen Democrats, have reservations about a bill that would set an overall limit for greenhouse gases and then allow emitters to buy and sell the pollution allowances allocated by the federal government. A Senate leadership aide, speaking on condition of anonymity in order to speak freely, said Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., who plans to take up a cap-and-trade measure later in the summer or in early fall, met earlier this month with between eight and 12 Democrats who "have some concern about going forward" with it.

The Waxman-Markey bill would reduce the nation's greenhouse gas emissions to 20 percent below 2005 levels by the year 2020, and by 83 percent as of 2050. Environmental Protection Agency administrator Lisa Jackson, who testified along with Energy Secretary Steven Chu and Transportation Secretary Ray LaHood, called the measure "a jobs bill."

Like many officials from fossil-fuel dependent sectors, David Ratcliffe, president and CEO of Southern Co., said the utility industry backs the long-term goals in the Waxman-Markey bill but wants to get free pollution allowances for between 10 and 15 years to keep energy prices in check. "We are supportive of a bill, but we've got to get a bill that does not significantly cost our customers in this new, challenging economic reality," he said.

Nuclear safety concerns raised

"They're just playing games."

Rep. Tony Klein, (D-Montpelier) chairman of the House of Natural Resources and Energy Committee, agrees that Entergy is delaying the decision process.

"We require a lot of benchmarks to be reached in order to come to a decision," said Klein, "and we're just not getting answers. What will the economic benefit be?

How much will they be charging for power? We were supposed to have that answer last September."

Of the 104 power plants in the country, Vermont Yankee is the only one that has a memorandum of understanding, in which there is a daily report to check that the plant is at 100 percent operating power and that safety precautions are being taken, according to Smith of Entergy.

"In a nuclear plant, when we have radioactive leaks, it is self-contained, inside one building, and is recycled by the water in the building," said Smith. "It is never released into the environment; it's never a danger to public health, or even the people who work in the plant."

But opponents of relicensing say that the plant is actually more dangerous than the company admits.

"It's one of the oldest plants in the country, and like anything it's going to have malfunctions; it's going to get less and less safe," said Stoleroff. "Radiation leaks on a daily basis, cooling towers collapse. It's like having a sitting time bomb."

Stoleroff compared the potential dangers of Vermont Yankee to Three Mile Island, the 1979 radioactive leak in Pennsylvania.

The closing of the plant would affect the economy, consumer's electric bills, and the employees of Vermont Yankee. The plant injects $1 million into the economy annually from payroll, employs 650 people from Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont, and supplies one-third of Vermont's electricity, says Smith. And he points out, nuclear energy produces less of the greenhouse gas emissions responsible for global warming.

"Vermont has the second-lowest carbon foot-print of any state in the country," said Smith. "If coal or oil from the Midwest replaced nuclear energy, that would change."

VYDA looks to other energy sources as alternatives. Wind, solar, biomass and geothermal energy were all cited as better alternatives.

"Any renewable sources we can use here in Vermont," said Stoleroff.

The United States is one of the only countries that does not reprocess its nuclear waste because it opens the possibility of waste being used for nuclear weapons. In the U.K., where reprocessing is allowed, nuclear provides over 80 percent of the energy, compared to the U.S. where it accounts for about 20 percent.

"I think that's a little ridiculous," said Entergy's Smith. "It's not like we're walking around with that material."

Still, the region's residents disagree about whether the plant's license should be renewed. According to Rep. Klein, after a town meeting on March 3, a total of 33 towns out of 38 voted against keeping the plant operating past 2012.

Smith reasons that a great deal of resistance is due to the fear of radioactive spills and waste storage. He described the process of storage and the safety precautions.

"Our fuel hundles stay in our reactors for four years," Smith explained. "Then they are put under water for another five years, and safely placed in dry-fuel storage canisters, which we have four of outside the plant."

Klein, however, cites other dangers, and questions the safety of keeping the plant running.

"The utilities are all in one generator. There's too much power, it's running at 120 percent of its designed capacity. This design isn't being built anymore. There's a constant turnover of employees," Klein said. "This type of technology requires perfection 24 hours-a-day, seven days-a-week, 365 days-a-year."

The NRC has been deliberating on the renewal for three and a half years.

Town meetings have been held periodically throughout that time regarding the issue, and continue to be held in Brattleboro. The most recent meeting was April 16. Entergy Nuclear expects a decision by this fall, while Klein and Stoleroff both predict results will not be seen until next year.

When asked if he thought the renewal would pass, Klein answered, "Had you asked me a year ago, I would have said it'd be a slam dunk. Lately there have been so many mishaps and [Entergy] haven't been open. Legislatures are concerned for how responsible Entergy will be."

Rebels in Sri Lanka surrender to gov.

BY MARK MAGNIER
LOS ANGELES TIMES

NEW DELHI — The ethos of the Tamil Tigers rebel group in Sri Lanka has always been to fight and die for the cause, namely, a homeland for the minority Tamils. So it wasn't surprising that the government treated the surrender Wednesday of two rebel officials as a significant coup – and further evidence of its imminent military victory.

The army quickly moved to score propaganda points after announcing it was holding Tiger media coordinator Velayuthan Thayanithi, who employed the alias Daya Master, and Velupillai Kumaru Pancharatnam, alias George Master, in custody after they approached government lines Wednesday morning with members of their families.

Their surrender came as "a rude shock to the outfit and its expatriates who have been pumping hard currency into the LTTE coffers," the army said in a statement, using the initials of the rebel group.

The report, as with many aspects of the South Asia island's protracted civil war, could not be confirmed. The military rarely allows media or international observers into the conflict zone, citing security concerns.

In recent months, the army has made significant advances in its quarter-century battle with the Tigers, known formally as the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam. Most of the remaining militants are reportedly trapped in a sliver of land along the northern coast roughly the size of New York's Central Park.

The army also said Wednesday it killed 43 guerrillas, suffered an undisclosed number of casualties itself and that 81,423 civilians have fled the war zone within the previous 72 hours. The United Nations, civic groups and foreign governments have repeatedly expressed their strong concerns for the welfare of the remaining trapped citizens.

As more people emerge, the government and aid organizations are struggling to ramp up relief efforts.

"The people are all absolutely exhausted and had a tedious journey and came out with little or nothing, many wading through waist-deep water, bringing their children," said Suresh Bartlett, Sri Lanka director for the humanitarian group World Vision, in a telephone interview from the town of Vavuniya on Wednesday after visiting a camp for displaced persons.

Bartlett said the camp he saw is housing 25,000 people, with another camp of roughly equal size under construction. In addition, many schools and playgrounds near the conflict area are being used as temporary quarters.

Once most of the displaced have the basics of food, water and shelter, the focus will shift to addressing some of the counseling and emotional needs of the stressed population, he added.

Paikiasothy Saravanamuttu, executive director of the Center for Policy Alternatives in Colombo, the capital, said the government had ample warning that tens of thousands of fleeing civilians would need help – especially given its repeated calls for noncombatants to vacate Tiger-held areas. As a result, it should have focused more on humanitarian issues earlier.

"The facilities made available for people coming out is woefully inadequate," he said. "They were still woefully unprepared."

The fact that rebel leaders are starting to give themselves up suggests the organization is conceding defeat, he added.

Dancing robot from Yale University takes YouTube by storm

BY ETHAN RODRIGUEZ-TORRENT
YALE DAILY NEWS

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Bright yellow, with a cartoonish nose and pair of eyes and standing about 4 inches tall above its base, Keepon looks like a cross between a marshmallow Peep and a snowman. And Keepon has become a YouTube sensation – because this robot can dance.

Keepon can improvise to any song with a reasonable beat, said Brian "Scaz" Scassellati, a Yale University computer science professor who received tenure last week, exposing the robot's inner workings while putting him through his paces. Partially built by former undergraduate Marek Michalowski '02 GRD '03 and imported from Japan, Keepon helps Scaz and his assistants – four graduate students and about seven undergraduates – study when and why humans identify with object motion.

Scassellati splits his time between Keepon and two other robots: Pleo, a cat-sized dinosaur that can be programmed to act out an endless variety of movements and behaviors, and Nico, a metallic replica of the upper body of a 1-year-old child made from motor cables and metal piping.

"The central focus of a lot of [my work] is understanding how kids are able to learn effectively from other people – from their parents and from their peers," Scassellati said. "We use robots as a way to both model this and to explore the boundaries of human social skills."

Scaz's team is probing a complicated question: What makes inserire humans qualities to Keepon?

"It's a blob that moves around," Scassellati pointed out. But when Keepon starts to bop its "head" to pop music, many intuitively perceive it to be dancing.

"It really challenges you to define the boundaries of what you're willing to attribute to something," he said.

For his part, the robotic torso Nico hardly looks human. But since Nico's function is not to interact with others but rather to simulate a developing child, Scassellati said it is his proportions and body structure that matter.

The way in which humans interact with the world is based in part on their body structure; since, for example, children and adults have proportionally different head sizes and arm lengths, they have different capabilities.

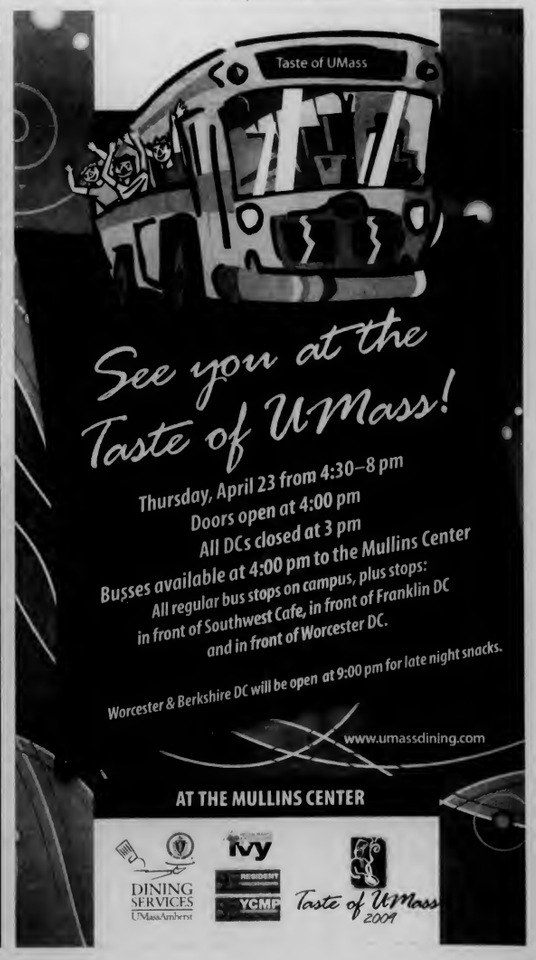
Nico has been used to model, among other things, the way in which children develop hand-eye coordination and learn about their senses.

Recently, Scassellati and Justin Hart GRD '12, a lab assistant and teaching assistant, were able to disprove the commonly accepted theory that children can identify the point at which their eyes focus.

Since its inception, humanoid robot development has been based on psychological or cognitive explanations of how humans think, Scassellati said.

"We turned to child development, using models from psychology, to tell us about how we might be able to build things," he said. "But we're also able to give back a little bit now, in terms of being able to evaluate these models and see which ones are actually coherent and which ones do what they say they do."

Pleo the dinosaur is a recently discontinued commercial toy that the team is using to research their biggest project: autism.



With different personalities and behaviors handily programmed onto standard, interchangeable SD memory cards, a fleet of Pleo clones are ideal playmates for children, motivating even those with autism to interact with them.

Meanwhile, researchers can step back and focus on a child's interactions.

"Running an experiment is pretty much always fun," said Elaine Short '10, who works at Scassellati's lab and takes one of his classes, "Intelligent Robotics."

After documenting interactions between Pleo and non-autistic children, Scassellati's team models social behaviors to autistic children which their disability prevents them from successfully learning. In particular, his current focus is on prosody, or the intonation of one's voice.

SGA can't legislate silence

S.P. Sullivan

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) did the right thing two weeks ago when it voted to condemn the content of conservative campus newspaper The Minuteman, whose first two issues were, at various points, racist, sexist, homophobic and plain ol' absurd, with some decent journalism thrown in here or there.

The SGA should've stopped at that.

But they went so far as to suspend the registered student organization (RSO) the Silent Majority, which publishes The Minuteman, and coerce an apology from them to appear as an advertisement on the pages of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. For the record, The Collegian decided it would run no such forced apology; the First Amendment is our insurance policy.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Esther Terry responded with a terse and formal "No."

"As the enactment does not reflect an appreciation of the Silent Majority's constitutional right to the exercise of free speech, I reject it altogether and recommend that it be rescinded in its entirety," she wrote in a letter to SGA President Ngozi Mbawuike, dated April 15.

So much for that.

And to think all this was over some vicious personal attacks that the SGA enactment, 2000-S54, called "slanderous," levied against Vanessa Snow, member of the SGA and student outreach program Student Bridges, which is the second-most funded agency on campus. For propriety's sake I won't even paraphrase.

John Beale, Editor in Chief of The Minuteman, told The Collegian the comments were intended as, "jokingly mean-spirited," and said he didn't think it was in good taste, but it came down to the majority of their editorial board. This semester, The Collegian's editorial board has voted on things like online voting in SGA elections, funding for higher education and the possible elimination of the UMass baseball program. Meanwhile, The Minuteman's editorial board voted on whether or not to resort to name-calling.

But Adam Kissell, a director of the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), said in an interview last week that the SGA is "wrong on just about every level," and sent a letter to Chancellor Robert C. Holub in The Minuteman's defense.

> If there is one way to make martyrs out of people who print a newspaper that contains content that's outright bigoted, it's to steal their newspaper from their hands.

Kissell argues that not only does the SGA's motion violate the Silent Majority's freedom of speech, but, because none of its members were invited to testify at the meeting, they violated their right to due process. On top of that, the appropriate charge would be libel, not slander, and even that's a stretch, considering Snow is an SGA member. Being a public official, even in student government, puts you in the public eye and can make you a target for satire, even the worst kind of satire, according to Kissell.

"And satire is even better protected than regular speech," he said.

Abusing the freedom of the press to personally attack those with whom you disagree makes you and your whole paper look like assholes (Whoops, I just pulled a Minuteman), but it doesn't mean student government can take away the rights the federal constitution gave you. The SGA had the moral high ground in this one, but they didn't have a legal leg to stand on.

Speaker Shaun Robinson, who sponsored the motion, told The Collegian that "all we are doing is enforcing the bylaws as they are written and those bylaws are the governing rules and regulations of our organization."

That much is true, but it seems that the bylaw itself, Title VII, Chapter 3, Section 10, might be out of line with the First Amendment, and thus unenforceable. The SGA's motion is just another example of members of the campus community – justifiably angry about hate speech and ad hominem attacks in The Minuteman – behaving unjustifiably.

FIRE's letter to the University last week was prompted by a video that surfaced on the Internet showing Snow and several other protesters at the Silent Majority's "Rally for Free Speech" on April 1 ripping newspapers from the hands of members of The Minuteman staff, who were peddling an attack rag and walked away martyrs.

Because if there is one way to make martyrs out of people who print a newspaper that contains content that's outright bigoted, it's to steal their newspaper from their hands. If there's another way, it's to try to use an unconstitutional bylaw to coerce an apology out of them.

You can't legislate away a problem like this. And I don't think that you can really have a dialogue with a newspaper whose idea of muckraking is reprinting information from the Center for Student Development's website peppered with personal insults. It's not a matter of the paper's political leanings, though surely there wouldn't be such uproar on campus if it were a liberal attack rag. But there's reporting with a point of view and then there's reporting with prejudice.

If campus community members want to show the vocal minority that calls itself the Silent Majority that discourse is one thing, but hate speech another, their best bet is to give The Minuteman the silent treatment.

Don't pick it up.

Add something besides alcohol to your college life

Thomas J. Moore

Could drinking be a waste of time at college? Cue the snickers, chuckles and knee slaps.

With the conditioned response out of our systems, let's get real for a minute. Forget Sam the Minuteman or Chemistry 100 – there's nothing that rallies the student body closer together like a freshly tapped keg of delicious Pabst Blue Ribbon.

We are all students in a culture which promotes on a loudspeaker that a handle of liquor is the necessary ingredient for fun during our four years of freedom. It's sad to say, but maybe it's possible that we're missing out on something pretty big.

If you want a true, clear-cut image of this culture I'm talking about, you don't have to throw rocks at cops in a Southwest-hosted riot or even go out on a Friday night to see it. All you need to do is swipe into any dining commons on a weekend afternoon and take a look around. What you'll see are a lot of men and women who look like they just returned from a war. Some have black eyes from trying to crush a beer can on their forehead and missing, while others are limping from a staircase that turned into a slip and slide. If they don't have a visible brokenness about them, they are trying to soothe the rhinoceros stampeding around inside their skulls.

In a world where the majority of its inhabitants are struggling in extreme poverty to obtain the mere necessities of life, the top richest one percent struggles with the fact of having too much fun last night. Something's not right.

I'm not bashing alcohol. It's great. Making friends and having a good time are two very crucial aspects to college. I cannot argue that.

College is a unique time and you will never have the same experience again in life. Never will you get to live a stone's throw away from dozens of your closest friends with a license for complete freedom and time in your hands. It is not whether or not you should be spreading your wings and having a good time that I am putting into question, but rather, whether beer should serve as a "necessary" ingredient to that good time.

> We are all students in a culture which promotes on a loudspeaker that a handle of liquor is the necessary ingredient for fun during our four years of freedom.

So what the hell am I getting at? Like some sappy Hollywood chick flick, my heart tells me that there's something wrong and something missing and I don't think I am alone.

There has to be more to Friday night than getting drunk. There has to be more to Saturday mornings than recovery time. There has to be more to three-day weekends than an extra night to go out. There has to be something more to a friendship than drunkenness can build. There has to be more to this college experience than just merely alcohol.

Why, you might ask, does this bother me? Because it's not enough, and basing our lives around drinking doesn't allow us to be fully alive. We're caught in a vicious cycle that severely limits the quality of fun we have. We're caught in a cycle that prevents us from fully experiencing life for all of its intended awe.

Two thousand years ago, there was a man that was in the same position as many people on this campus. He was lame from birth and unable to act of his own accord. He couldn't experience life because of his crippled condition. Although not all of us are crippled physically, we sense a lack of life just as this man did.

Two men named Peter and John met him and through their interaction, this man was able to walk again and able to be fully alive. He jumped up and down for the first time in his life, he yelled at the top of his lungs and moon-walked through the dusty streets.

It wasn't a special medicine or beverage that Peter and John used to cure this man of his lameness. It was an experience they had with a man named Jesus that they shared with him. That very same experience that put life into useless legs 2,000 ago can certainly put some fun into our brokenness today.

Jesus, as God and the creator of all life, fun and good times is the necessary ingredient for fullness of life. Drinking may be pleasing to my senses, but I'd be lying if I said that it satisfies my soul. There's a level of freedom and happiness that we all call joy, which can only be experienced through Jesus Christ.

Let's be honest, Christians don't do an awesome job of living this out. But we're human, so we fall short. If you are a Christian, I challenge you to get off your butt and have more fun and take advantage of the sacrifice that was made for you to be fully alive.

If you don't have a relationship with God, I challenge you to explore the truth that is in Jesus and the newness of life that he offers. There is in fact something more to this college experience and it's found in the fullness of life found in Jesus.

GIVING A HOOT ABOUT ONLINE VOTING

Dear Editor,
RE: "Stop complaining, start voting," by Subhan Tariq; April 13

I direct the Center for Educational Software Development, a software development group here on campus that, among other things, created and maintains the Online Web-based Learning (OWL) homework system. In December we were asked by the Student Government Association (SGA) Elections Commissioner if the OWL system could be adapted for use in online SGA elections, a question we have explored over the course of the spring. For this reason I was interested in the column in the April 14 Collegian by Subhan Tariq, "Stop Complaining, Start Voting", in which he touches on the issue of online elections but also makes some unsubstantiated claims about the OWL system being unreliable and insecure. These claims are not true.

First, I endorse Tariq's sentiment that students should more actively engage in their own government. The SGA is in charge of significant aspects of student life and controls a substantial budget to affect these activities each year. That more students aren't willing to participate, or at least stay informed of these activities, is unfortunate.

The proposal to move elections from paper ballots to an online process is geared, from my understanding, to increasing turnout at the twice-yearly elections, a turnout that typically ranges from 7 percent to 12 percent of eligible students. As Tariq points out, this is far below the average for national elections. Moving elections online will introduce a number of policy and procedural issues that the SGA board must grapple with, should it decide this is a wise and effective way to increase voter participation. A few other schools, such as the University of Texas at Austin, have crossed this bridge already and no doubt learned important lessons that could benefit SGA deliberations.

However, issues of election policy and procedure are not the same as issues of software security and reliability, and I hope the debate over whether to move online is not confused by this difference. The OWL system, created here at UMass 13 years ago as one of the first in the country, has a long track record of reliability, scalability and secure operation. It is currently used by some 20 campus departments supporting roughly 20,000 users each year.

It has been licensed from the University by a major publisher, Cengage Learning, who sells it as an add-on homework product with its large line of introductory chemistry textbooks. Over 100,000 chemistry students pay between $12 and $37 each year to use it. The Massachusetts Department of Education uses OWL to provide standardized testing in almost 200 adult basic education programs across the state. UMassOnline uses OWL to collect online course evaluations from thousands of students at the end of each semester in a secure way. The American Chemical Society is collaborating with us to produce a high stakes testing application using OWL to deliver their internationally recognized, norm-referenced chemistry exams.

In short, OWL has been around for a long time and has built a reputation for being the very things Tariq claims it is not. He provides no supporting evidence for these claims, and in fact, we have never been invited to make a formal presentation to the SGA governing board to either explain how the system could be adapted for elections or argue for OWL's integrity as a delivery system. We would welcome such an opportunity if the SGA is serious about pursing online elections.

CAN'T COPE WITH STUDENT PREGNANCY

Dear Editor,
RE: "Pregnant parking," by Michele Copeland; April 16

I was quite disappointed with Michele Copeland's column "Pregnant Parking." My question is, why is she complaining about accessible parking spaces when it was her choice to get pregnant in the first place? Of course, all UMass students would like a parking space right next to their academic building. Michele seems surprised, and in her words "infuriated," by getting a $40 parking citation for parking in a 15-minute loading zone. It's hard to believe that she is graduating next month with a statement like that. It's just like saying, "I know I was stealing, but I didn't mean to actually get caught!" She also notes that a solution is easy, just "create parking for pregnant women."

I also have a simple solution, Copeland could, like the rest of us students, wake up earlier and wait for a bus to bring her to her destination once she parks in her designated lot. I understand it is more difficult for off-campus students to get to class on time, but living off campus is her choice as well. Copeland should not be blaming and complaining about the university because it is not catering to her life choices.

DEFLUMERI NOT FRONT PAGE MATERIAL

Dear Editor,
RE: "Republican Club vice president arrested, banned from offices," by Adam P. Coulter; April 9

This is absolutely absurd.

If I were still at campus, I would ask people to stop reading The Daily Collegian. While I agree that Brad DeFlumeri's charges are serious, they are not the business of The Daily Collegian to dive into such detail with. Many students at UMass get into trouble with the law, hundreds do. Drugs, underage drinking, violence, what have you. It's all wrong and all should be dealt with by the law.

However, unless it directly dangers the greater campus community (as was the case in the Jason incident) The Daily Collegian does nothing more than place a police log entry. This is being treated as the story of the year, over a personal matter that all of us know absolutely nothing about. The likelihood that DeFlumeri's actions were illegal are just as likely that they weren't, not enough evidence or proof exists to tarnish his reputation. If DeFlumeri were a politician receiving a state or federal salary I would understand. But this is a college student, just like all of us, being thrust into the limelight for something that has not been proven. Please refrain from posting anymore on the matter until a legitimate threat or impact upon the UMass community can be found by the police. The Daily Collegian is employed by college students and this is nothing more than weekly tabloid fodder, not something I would expect from aspiring journalists who might wish to make some sort of impact on our world.

MAKING A SCAPEGOAT

Dear Editor,
RE: "No 2nd chance with plagiarism," by Steve Fox; April 21

Yes, Ms. Sobel did something that she knew was wrong.

Yes, she jeopardized the respectability of your paper by doing it.

Yes, she deserved to be fired.

But running Steve Fox's article about plagiarism shows a real lack of character on your part. Had the article actually been about the wrongs of plagiarism and the repercussions that it brings it would have been acceptable, but Fox clearly shows his anger and frustration with Sobel in his article, and he does so very publicly and very rudely. His article being printed in your paper therefore comes across as you showing your anger and frustration with Sobel very publicly and very rudely.

When an employee screws up as badly as she did you must get rid of her, but publicly shaming her for her actions only makes an already bad situation worse. Not only does it bring further attention to a subject that you should want to keep under wraps, but it also shows a lack of integrity by your organization when you use your power to bash former employees.

IF YOU CAN'T SELL IT, IT'S FREE

Dear Editor,
RE: "Administration rejects SGA suspension of The Minuteman," by S.P. Sullivan; April 21

I wanted to comment on a quote in today's paper in the article "Administration rejects SGA suspension of The Minuteman." "The following week, commuter senator Derek Khanna filed a motion to redact the bill, citing FIRE's letter, which would mandate a full-page ad in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian and the return of $1,500, the estimated value of newspapers stolen, to the Silent Majority."

I'm not sure whose language this is but if you are referring to the stack of newspapers taken during the April 1 free speech rally then they were certainly not "stolen." Shortly after the picture of Vanessa Snow was taken with her foot on the newspapers there was a dispute over the newspapers which a policewoman settled. According to her, because the Silent Majority didn't have a permit to sell the newspapers, they had to be distributed freely. Then people took a bunch of copies of the Minuteman to "distribute freely" or who knows what. While the Silent Majority may claim that they were stolen there was certainly nothing illegal about what happened and a policewoman saw the whole thing.

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Willie Nelson brought his old, beat-up guitar "Trigger" to the Mullins Center Friday. The country legend performed his classics after actor Billy Bob Thornton's mediocre band the Boxmasters bored the crowd.

Classic country singers play Mullins Center

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

Last Friday, two living legends touched down at UMass. While most students were prepping their dorms, apartments, houses and/or stomachs for the long weekend ahead, the campus population was graced with a show that they likely will never have a chance to see again.

The Mullins Center was packed, primarily with an older fan base, to experience a concert headlined by legendary musician, actor and activist Willie Nelson. Nelson is known mainly for his accolades as a country singer, but has become newsworthy as of late for his initiative to legalize marijuana in the United States.

Billy Bob Thornton and the Boxmasters were ticketed as the opening act, followed by Ray Price. Price was a member of the Cherokee Cowboys, along with big names like Roger Miller and of course, Willie Nelson. He was an innovator of western swing music, also known as honky tonk, and was inducted in the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1996.

The lights went to an uncomfortable space-like darkness as latecomers were shuffling to their seats. They flashed on the stage and there he was, Billy Bob Thornton, jumping right into his first song. Yes, that's the Billy Bob Thornton from "Bad Santa" and "Bad News Bears." As each title suggests, there is a common trend in Thornton's work that has continued to blossom brilliantly as he transforms into what he refers to as a "musician."

After being almost literally booed out of Canada and canceling a few shows due to a reported "stomach flu," the Boxmasters rejoined the tour when it came back to the States this past week.

Thornton had the stage presence of a coked-up wax mannequin. He turned his back to the audience following each song, downing whiskey and chain-smoking his way through the set list.

Had someone not thrown what appeared to be a joint onstage, the audience could have reasonably hypothesized that there was in fact an alcoholic robot slightly resembling that guy from "The Astronaut Farmer" trying to sing in front of them. He picked it up with a genuine smirk and mouthed thanks to the fairly inebriated fan.

The conspicuous superlatives did not end with the Boxmasters, however. Their songs were indistinguishable from each other, and were boring at best. It would have been bad enough had they just played cliché country songs, but their music reeked of a failed attempt to actually be a cliché country group.

The musicians rushed through their songs (thankfully), and were not even remotely in sync with each other. The band apparently must have not able to practice while Thornton was recovering from his illness.

The final song was heralded by a plea from Billy Bob to the audience. If "it wasn't too much, could y'all stand up for the last song?" he asked. As if it were the seventh inning stretch of a one-sided baseball game, the audience reluctantly stood up as he requested.

While the Boxmasters could not have ended their set any sooner, the show was about to take a 90-degree turn towards excitement and liveliness. Following his band, who had already settled in on the stage, and a rousing introduction by his guitarist, Ray Price walked slowly into the light and took the microphone to a breathtaking ovation.

He was as vivacious and exhilarating as any 81-year old man could be physically but the power of his booming and crisp voice surmounted his aged body. His performance was classy and respectable, with each song driven by a voice that's seen the road and sees its end, but isn't ready to pull over.

His band was superb, emphasizing his greatness while fleshing a sound that few would find unpleasant. The sound was personified by the masterful work of the pedal steel guitar and three violinists.

The act was just beginning to lose momentum when Price took a gentle bow and left just as he had come. Completing the full 180 turn from the Boxmasters, Willie Nelson casually took the stage with the humility of a lifelong best friend.

Dressed in a t-shirt and jeans, Nelson was fully equipped with his famous guitar "Trigger" and a cowboy hat. The soon to be 76-year-old Nelson shredded his guitar like it was 1969 again. His quick fingers perfectly executing the unique riffs and unparalleled country soft rock solos for which he has grown

Trannies at Thompson

Traveling 'Tranny Roadshow' makes a stop at UMass, making gender education fun

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

Webster's Dictionary defines a "transgender" person as being someone who has "personal characteristics ... that transcend traditional gender boundaries and corresponding sexual norms." In today's society, many people are artificially grouped together, stereotyped by their common possession of uncommon "personal characteristics." When this happens, what often is lost among the characteristics are the personalities. Last Tuesday night, a ragtag group of performers came to UMass with the goal of bringing personality back in force.

Hosted by the UMass Stonewall center for LGBT students, the Tranny Roadshow is a variety show featuring many different styles of performance art. The Roadshow is unique in that every one of its performers identifies themselves as transgender.

"We do transgender events frequently, and we have touring groups pretty frequently as well," said Brett-Genny Janiczek Beemyn, director of the Stonewall Center, who noted that this was one of their first events to combine the two.

Since 2004, the seemingly nomadic Tranny Roadshow has been touring the country, picking up new talent as is goes along. It began as an idea by Jamez Terry and Kelly Shortandqueer, who hoped make a show that would "make transgender issues more fun and less intellectual, build bridges between marginalized communities, and concentrate on trans-people without focusing solely on their genders," according to the show's website.

The show has been quite successful in its attempts to make gender issues more accessible. The first performer of the evening was Red Durkin, a "trans-woman" and a stand-up comic. Now for most people, the term "educational but fun" induces a cringe, as it brings back painful memories of childhood "edutainment," but Red Durkin was more Eddie Izzard than Dora the Explorer. Red managed to be genuinely funny, while bringing to light some of the difficulties of being transgendered.

The show went on from there with a procession of rappers, poets, storytellers and musicians. The sound quality was generally poor, but to their credit, Thompson 106 was not built for live stage performances. One of the better musicians was Modern Day Pinocchio, an electric guitarist who summed up the feeling of the evening with a selection of songs about "being happy being where you are."

The musicians were, on the whole, not terribly talented. From the wardrobe-challenged B.O.I. Sha, to the confusing and vibrato-heavy Chastine Patterson, many of the acts were less than encore-worthy.

The Dead make amends, tour

By Steve Knopper
Newsday

In order to play improvisational rock music on stage for hours at a time, it turns out, the musicians actually have to get along. Which was a problem for the surviving members of the Grateful Dead during their 2004 tour, when they were so miffed about online concert bootlegs, money and other issues that they could barely talk to each other.

But, thanks to a Rhino Records archive contract, a healing Barack Obama benefit early last year and a friend acting as a mediator, Bob Weir, Mickey Hart, Phil Lesh and Bill Kreutzmann have eliminated the internal strife in time to open a new Dead tour this year.

"Yeah, that's gone. The last tours were a little tough, none of those problems are coming up," percussionist Kreutzmann says by phone from Washington, D.C., the day after the Dead's tour-opener in Greensboro, N.C. "That had to go away at the beginning of the rehearsals. If there had been any of that kind of tension, I would have blown the whistle on it – because I won't tolerate it anymore.

"We're there to have fun and, most importantly, give the Deadheads a joyous time, especially with the economy the way it is," he adds. "If you can provide happiness with a group of people, boy, do it, because it comes back to you."

The Dead opened the tour April 12 on a symbolic note, with 1975's "The Music Never Stopped." That's true - even after the last Dead tour, which grossed $18 million, guitarist Weir performed regularly with Ratdog, bassist Lesh went out with his Friends, drummer Mickey Hart's band played several gigs, and Kreutzmann performed with his trio BK3 and veteran singer-guitarist Papa Mali.

"It's really great to play with a lot of different musicians," Kreutzmann says, "because when you bring it home to the Grateful Dead, you have new things to do and new stories to tell."

Kreutzmann, 62, joined an early incarnation of the Dead known as the Warlocks in 1964. He was 18, and the perfect rock drummer for the band as guitarist Jerry Garcia, keyboardist Ron "Pigpen" McKernan, Weir and Lesh transitioned from San Francisco folk-scene jug band to a louder electric-blues style. Hart joined the band, by now the Grateful Dead, in 1967, ushering in a long, legendary creative period in which the two percussionists formed the basis of the band's jamming sound.

Over time, the band that once existed to play free-form folk, country and blues songs in San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury area in the late '60s turned into a hippie juggernaut, the focal point of a massive international community that regenerates obsessive fans on a regular basis. Garcia's death in 1995, though, sent the surviving members scattering legendary.

Willie treated the audience with his most popular songs including "Mammas Don't Let Your Babies Grow Up to Be Cowboys," "Always On My Mind" and "On The Road Again." Ray Price came back out to perform a duet of "Crazy," Nelson also presented his famous rendition of "Georgia On My Mind" and even covered Toby Keith's hit, "Beer for My Horses."

However, the set seemed a bit rushed and impersonal. He played and sang his songs quickly, making singing along with them difficult and awkward. To say this hindered the show would be blasphemy, but it was a noticeable blemish.

There certainly could have been more Willie and much less, if any, Thornton but in the end, the greatness of the two vibrant Hall-of-Famers outshined the awful embarrassment to music that is Billy Bob Thornton and the Boxmasters.

included poets, storytellers and canvas artists, but the act that stood out the most was by a unique individual named Ignacio Rivera. Rivera, a social activist and performance artist, took to the stage in his street clothes, appearing to untrained eyes as a fairly convincing male. He proceeded to turn on a sultry soundtrack and, with the help of a few props, perform a sort of "strip-tease."

Rivera slowly made a transition from suit jacket to lingerie, and continued his bizarre, sultry performance as a woman, playing both parts naturally and convincingly before stripping down completely to reveal his body – a female body. Ignacio paused and allowed the audience to inspect him, before suiting back up as a man and walking quietly off-stage.

This act, called "Gender Fed," was one of the last of the night, and it was certainly the most stunning. Even to the largely LGBT audience, the bold performance had a bewildering effect.

It had to be kept in mind that this was not Lollapalooza. The eclectic artists were drawn together not by their popularity, but because of their membership in a marginal community and their shared gender. Gender identity, while not explicitly part of every act, was the overall theme of the show, and it made itself well known. The Tranny Roadshow portrayed every one of its members not only as transpeople, but as human beings with passions and talents, and to that end it was successful. It is unlikely that anyone left the auditorium that night without a clearer picture of who, as people, the trannies were.

The Dead back from grave

temporarily in different directions.

Kreutzmann's immediate response to the loss of his longtime friend was to buy a house in Kauai, Hawaii, where he lives today. Whereas Lesh, Weir and Hart re-emerged quickly with other bands, Kreutzmann didn't perform publicly until 1998, with a trio called Backbone. He didn't participate in the Dead's first reunion that year, as the Other Ones, but joined up in 2000.

"It wasn't really a vacation," he recalls. "I really moved there - I didn't realize it - for healing."

Eventually, the Other Ones morphed back into the Dead, touring in 2003 and 2004 before hitting the road this year for 18 dates. With Allman Brothers Band regular Warren Haynes in place of Garcia, and Jeff Chimenti as the latest in a long line of keyboardists, the Dead rehearsed for 12 days before the tour.

For the new gigs, Kreutzmann's son, Justin, 39, a veteran documentarian who has produced films about the Dead and The Who, is on hand with his video camera. Discussion of the percussionist's family leads to a recollection of his own parents, who weren't exactly thrilled about his rock 'n' roll career early on.

"A lot of parents make the mistake of 'my kid has to be like I am,'" he says. "Both my parents went to Stanford and got master's degrees, and my dad really wanted me to go to Stanford, and he really wasn't too excited when he found out all I really wanted to do was play the drums. But he let me follow my passions.

"He got a divorce from my mother, and his new wife was a classical piano player. She said, 'How dare you not support your son in his music?' He showed up at a Grateful Dead gig with a Grateful Dead T-shirt (in roughly the late '70s) and that was it," Kreutzmann continues. "It was great. I laughed like hell! And everybody that was there that saw the shirt laughed like hell."

Dead devotees sell renditions of Jerry Garcia among tie-dye shirt sellers. Five years after a tour plagued with not getting along and worrying about money, the Dead are back on tour.

UMass staying focused in '09

Minutewomen not looking ahead to NCAAs just yet

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

It's tough not getting complacent when just about everything is going right.

For the Massachusetts softball team that's the current challenge. With 16 straight wins, Samantha Salato hitting home runs with startling frequency and a pitching staff that has taken six out of nine Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week awards, it becomes tough to keep your focus on the next game and not the bigger picture.

For the No. 17 Minutewomen (27-6, 10-0 A-10) the goal all year has been the College World Series and the assumption by most people was that UMass would make at least yet another NCAA Tournament. The Minutewomen don't make that assumption and have done well all year – and in past years – of not making that mistake.

To UMass, every game is important, including Thursday's matchup with Connecticut at 4 p.m. in Storrs, Conn. Not only do the Minutewomen have a strong rivalry with the Huskies (25-16, 7-10 Big East), but they have used each game as a stepping-stone towards their ultimate goal. No matter how inferior the opponent is on paper, the Minutewomen have stayed focused.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino understands that with the team's success comes a target on their backs. Every team, whether a sub-.500 non-conference foe like Boston College or a team at the bottom of the A-10 standings such as George Washington – both teams who took the Minutewomen to extra innings this month – is gunning for UMass and can't be overlooked.

To this point, staying on course, staying focused and taking steps towards a trip to the College World Series is exactly what the Minutewomen have done. As well as winning its past 16 games, UMass has won 48 straight A-10 games and 50 consecutive regular season games at home.

UConn, however, makes it easy for the Minutewomen to stay focused. First, there is the long-standing rivalry between the two teams. In the all-time series UMass leads by a slim margin (43-41-2), but under Sortino, the two schools are dead even at 40-40-1. Secondly, the Huskies may have a poor conference record, but it is deceiving. In the Big East, UConn plays the likes of No. 18 Louisville and No. 19 DePaul, a schedule that never gives the Huskies a break.

Many of the Minutewomen will look to continue to keep focused on the diamond just as they were last week. Salato, coming off a week in which she went 8-for-14 with seven home runs, a double and 11 RBI, hopes to continue her streak at the plate. While the Huskies pitching staff hasn't given up many home runs on the season – 18 in 41 games – there were few pitchers last week who could keep Salato inside the park.

In the circle for UMass, senior Brandice Balschmiter has continued to bring in weekly honors. The Minutewomen's ace was named the A-10 Pitcher of the Week for the second time in three weeks as she continued to climb up the UMass record books.

Early in the week, Balschmiter became the all-time wins leader at UMass when she threw a no-hitter against Providence for her 109th career victory – she now has 112 after going 4-0 last week – and later in the week recorded another UMass record with 19 strikeouts in UMass' extra-inning affair with George Washington on Friday.

With streaks, awards and records constantly surrounding the Minutewomen all season long, they have shown the ability to stay focused and not get ahead of themselves.

A road trip to visit a long-time rival is never a bad thing to help a team stay in the present.

Junior shortstop Whitney Williams covers the third base bag in a game earlier this season at the UMass Softball Complex. The Minutewomen take on rival UConn Thursday as part of a one-game break from Atlantic 10 Conference play.

Top-seeded UM to play GW in A-10s

Senior Meghan Reddy has 28 goals this season. The Minutewomen will face the Colonials in the upcoming A-10 Tournament.

the Colonials went 1-3 to close out the season. That one win, though, was a key victory against Duquesne – the lone A-10 team to beat UMass that gave George Washington the tie-breaker over the Dukes.

The Colonials are led by junior attacker Taylor Donohue while the Minutewomen feature sophomore attacker Jackie Lyons as their main offensive threat. The two are neck-and-neck in production with Lyons holding a slight lead in points per game with 3.56, compared to Donohue's 3.44.

In the first game between the two teams, the Minutewomen dismantled the Colonials as part of their five-game winning streak earlier in the season. Midfielder Haley Smith scored four goals and Florence made nine saves as George Washington didn't have an answer for UMass.

The five-game winning streak was the breakout for the Minutewomen after they started the season 3-6. Venechanos says that, since the team took the field at the beginning of the season, it has been steadily improving.

"We're constantly trying to improve our consistency and things that will make us look better. Our chemistry is improving, so is our passing defense at midfield and we expect everyone to be clicking this Friday," Venechanos said.

Richmond, the team that ended UMass postseason run last year, enters this year's tournament as the No. 2 seed with a 5-2 conference record. The Spiders won the tie-breaker with Saint Joseph's (also 5-2) by winning the regular-season finale against the Hawks – the No. 3 seed in the tournament.

In order to face-off against either the Hawks or the Spiders, the Minutewomen will have to avoid the upset against the Colonials, a position that the players know is in stark contrast from a year ago.

"That's sort of the story of this year," Rosenzweig said. "We were the fourth seed last year and we beat the 1-seed and this year we're the 1-seed and we can't let them knock us off.

"We can't let up. We have to let it all go. People are going to come after us and we have to come right back at them."

Saturday will be the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's last home game. But they don't exactly have that familiar home-field advantage.

Instead of playing on Garber Field, the Garber Gorilla's will move south to McGuirk Alumni Stadium to host No. 2 Syracuse in UMass' second-to-last regular-season game this season.

"The surface is different, the acoustics are different. Its actually better acoustics down at the stadium than there is here at Garber," UMass coach Greg Cannella said of the adjustments his team has to make switching venues. "The surface is field turf. It's a bigger venue, but still you play on 110 by 60. So the field is no different dimensions-wise."

The last time the Minutemen played at McGuirk was on April 26, 1997 – also against Syracuse. The Minutemen lost 9-4. This weekend, UMass is setting out to break the all-time lacrosse home attendance record that was set on May 6, 1989 when 12,143 people saw Syracuse defeat the Minutemen, 10-9.

Preparing for No. 2

The Minutemen are heading into Saturday after a busy week, losing to Georgetown, 10-7, last Saturday, but coming back to beat Fairfield on Tuesday, 12-6. Syracuse, on the other hand, hasn't won a game since its 15-13 victory over Albany on April 17.

"It depends on your team from year-to-year, that changes. Early in the year we didn't do very well with the Saturday, Tuesday, Saturday thing," said Cannella, unsure of whether the busy week is an advantage or disadvantage for his team. "[Last season] we lost two in a row on Tuesday (April 19 - 12-8 loss to Georgetown) and Saturday (April 22 – 10-9 loss to Fairfield).

"This year we were able to bounce back, we lost on Saturday but then we won Tuesday and we'll see what happens this Saturday. Our guys really need to get rest and get their legs back for sure," he added.

It is a tight week for the Minutemen; they have three days to prepare for the defending national champions, but surprisingly Cannella doesn't seem too worried.

"I think it's no different than preparing for Fairfield or someone else. They're on the schedule so you've got to prepare," Cannella said.

Players stepping up

Jim Connolly and Tim Balise can't be expected to do everything, especially against the No. 2 team in the nation.

After UMass' 12-6 win over Fairfield, the Minutemen proved that there are other players that can help out the duo on offense.

UMass' midfield accounted for seven of the team's 12 goals on Tuesday. Evan Blum earned his first career hat trick, while Bobby Hayes tallied two goals and two assists, and Rory Pedrick added two tallies.

The Minutemen's midfield had been quiet, as of late, and it has led to UMass struggling a bit on offense. Connolly and Balise continue to lead the team in goals (55 between the two), but are targeted by the opposing team's defense. With players like Blum, Hayes and Pedrick stepping up, they have created a balance that has been missing a little bit on offense.

UMass senior Evan Blum notched his first-career hat trick Tuesday in a 12-6 win over Fairfield. The Minutemen saw increased production from its midfielders, who scored seven goals in that game.

One step closer

After defeating Fairfield on Tuesday, the No. 16 Minutemen moved to 5-1 in conference play (8-4 overall), tied with Loyola for first place in the Eastern College Athletic Conference. The winner of the ECAC gets an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament.

The Minutemen have one ECAC game remaining, May 2 at Rutgers, while Loyola plays Hobart on Saturday. UMass holds the tie-breaker over Loyola, so if Loyola loses on Saturday it doesn't matter what the Minutemen do against Rutgers.

Either a Loyola loss to Hobart or an UMass win over Rutgers will clinch the ECAC for the Minutemen.

Clash No. 36 between elite programs, fierce rivals set for Saturday

"Controlling our emotions is key," Cannella said. "How do you handle yourself with a ton of fans: do you get too excited? Do you not? You still have to execute regardless if its 15,000 or 500. And hopefully we can handle that."

And there's something else out of its control that could play a factor: UMass has played two games (Tuesday's win over Fairfield and Saturday's loss to Georgetown) in the last six days while Syracuse (10-2) hasn't played since April 17. Cannella doesn't think that will play much of a factor, but "we need to get some rest and get our legs back."

But more importantly UMass will have to try to contain – "you can't shut them down, you have to limit certain people out on the field" – easily one of the most talented and balanced teams in the country.

Whether it's Kenny Nims (22 goals, 28 assists), Stephen Keogh (37 G, 6 A) or Chris Daniello (17 G) at attack or Dan Hardy (18 G, 14 A), Pat Perritt (11 G, 11 A) or Matt Abbott at midfield – the stellar UMass defense certainly has a lot to worry about.

"They have at least one guy at every position that can dominate a game," Cannella said.

That includes defensive midfielder Joel White ("who is as good at the pole than anyone you'll see"), Jovan Miller at short-stick defensive midfield ("as good an athlete as you'll see") and Sid Smith and goalkeeper John Galloway (8.37 goals-against average, .535 save percentage) on defense.

It's a challenge that the Minutemen relish.

"There is this edge that you feel that you need to prove something against a bunch of guys who are more highly-recruited than UMass guys in general," senior Rory Pedrick said. "It gives you a chip on your shoulder to prove that you're just as good and you belong out there [against them]."

Led by arguably the premier goalkeeper in the country in Doc Schneider, the Minutemen have the personnel on defense (comparable to Virginia or Princeton – the only two teams to beat the Orange this season) to help counter Syracuse's firepower.

Schneider, who ranks in the Top 5 in the country in both goals-against average (6.86) and save percentage (.661), is one of just two goalies in the country to be a finalist for the Tewaarton Trophy – the "Heisman Trophy" of college lacrosse.

Defensive stars Diogo Godoi and Brennan Mack, along with Schneider, Travis Tripucka and a host of other defenders will have to try to limit the penalties. The Minutemen have committed an average of 3.9 penalties per game – something that Syracuse will make them pay for.

Syracuse is an incredible 19-for-39 on the man-advantage this season. But UMass has been up for the challenge when on the man-down, successfully killing 36-of-45 (.800) of its penalties.

"We'll be better if we don't foul. They have guys who can shoot the lights out of the ball. Whether it's from 10 yards [out] or 20 yards, they'll still burn you," Cannella said.

UMass has some dynamic goal-scorers of its own. Jim Connolly (30 goals) and Tim Balise (25) rank as one of the best-scoring duos in the nation and recently the Minutemen have seen increased production from its midfielders, including Bobby Hayes (10), Evan Blum (13) and Rory Pedrick (11).

Much like the Orange, the Minutemen have their fair share of play-makers from all over the field. That similarity is no accident.

"Since I've been here, we try to model ourselves after Syracuse. I think if you're a program you'd be a fool not to try to model yourself after their program because it's so successful," Cannella said. "And the way that they play is a fun way to play and enjoyable way to play for your athletes, because they allow their athletes to excel and show the coaches what they can do.

"And it helps in recruiting and the people who watch your games because they're excited about it."

Just don't expect the excited fans – or the players – to be nice to each other.

Notes

Syracuse won last year's meeting, 16-3, at the Carrier Dome. ... UMass' NCAA victory over Syracuse in 2005 ended Syracuse's run of making the Final Four at 22 straight years. ... UMass' victory in 2007 ended Syracuse's streak of making 24 straight NCAA Tournaments and 31 straight seasons of at least a .500 record.

The Minutemen celebrate as goalkeeper Doc Schneider gets lifted up into the air after UMass defeated Syracuse, 9-7, back in 2007 at Garber Field. The two heated rivals are back in action against each other Saturday afternoon, this time with the game at McGuirk Stadium.

Minutemen have hands full with defending nat'l champs

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just because the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team tries to emulate Syracuse's program, doesn't mean they have to like them.

In fact, nothing about the UMass-Syracuse rivalry reminds anyone of a term of endearment. And that's partly what makes this annual matchup so much fun.

The recent overtime and NCAA classics. The Minutemen ruining some of the most impressive streaks in lacrosse history. The two teams rubbing victories in each others' faces. The trash-talk. The rabid fans. The emotion.

All good reasons to watch on Saturday when No. 16 UMass and defending national champions – and second-ranked – Syracuse square off at McGuirk Stadium for the 36th installment of one of the best rivalries in all of lacrosse.

UMass coach Greg Cannella is certainly aware of the attention that this game brings, including the intensity and genuine disdain between the two teams.

"In any sport, if you're going to beat the best, you have to be at your best. And in lacrosse, as in any other competitive sport, you can't be nice," he said. "Syracuse is never nice to us when they beat the crap out of us and we weren't nice to them when we won our games.

"That's the way sports are and I think that [the dislike between the teams] and the things that were said [between the players and from the crowd] out on the field is blown out of proportion by certain media outlets. I don't agree with any of that stuff, but that's just part of sports."

How well his players control their emotions and set aside some of the outside hoopla surrounding the game will be a major factor come Saturday afternoon in Cannella's mind. A victory would almost assuredly give UMass (8-4, 5-1 ECAC) an automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament, and a loss wouldn't affect the Minutemen's chances in the ECAC. Either a loss by Loyola to Hobart on Saturday or a win for UMass over Rutgers on May 2 would clinch the conference championship and a spot in the NCAAs for the Minutemen.

But for now, Cannella's crew has plenty of other things to focus on. Not only are they playing the defending national champions, but the Minutemen will have to adjust to playing at McGuirk for the first time since a 1997 loss to ... Syracuse.

"The [field turf] surface is different [than the artificial turf at Garber Field] and it's a bigger venue, but you still play on a 110x60 field. The dimensions are no different," Cannella said of the adjustments of playing at McGuirk.

Despite the unfamiliarity for UMass at McGuirk (which is a football stadium), it will provide a huge boost in attendance. The crowd is expected to surpass 10,000 fans, which is nine-times more than what they average at Garber Field (1,132).

UMass and Syracuse really don't get along on the lacrosse field. They will show it Saturday in the 36th all-time meeting between the schools.

UMass-'Cuse have heated, special rivalry

Eli Rosenswaike

Sometimes I get the inkling that coaches don't particularly enjoy all the hype given to "rivalry games." Maybe I get that feeling because Greg Cannella told me so.

"I get tired of it, most definitely," he said of all the talk. "The media creates sort of this frenzy, and it feeds into the guys on your team."

Gracious as always, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach absolved me (but not necessarily The Daily Collegian) of the blame. And after critiquing the media, he was sure to butter us up a little bit.

"But thank God for the media, or else we wouldn't have any exposure for our sport in general," Cannella said. "But you want to make sure your guys stay focused on what's important and that's what happens between the lines – not anything else."

You can see why he gets tired of all the hoopla. He gets asked about it all the time; he has to deal with the extra attention, the distractions and the (trash) talk between the players that inevitably comes with these games.

But that's precisely why we in the media love these games so much: the drama; the heightened pressure; the high-stakes involved; the passion; the atmosphere; the venom between the opposing players and the classic games that all that creates.

When UMass and Syracuse meet on the lacrosse field, that's exactly what you'll see.

Just ask any player on the Minutemen. They'll tell you how special this annual meeting with the second-ranked and defending national champion Syracuse team really is.

"There is this edge that you feel that you need to prove something against a bunch of guys who are more highly-recruited than UMass guys in general," senior Rory Pedrick said. "It gives you a chip on your shoulder to prove that you're just as good and you belong out there [against them].

"It's definitely fun to beat the Orange," he added, with a giant grin.

It's understandable that Cannella may grow tired of it a little bit – lord knows I asked him enough about the rivalry – but he has certainly enjoyed some of what it entails.

He fondly recalled many of those memories – the two thrilling wins in 2005, Jeff Zywicki's dominance against the Orange and Brett Garber's hat trick in the 2007 win – but he didn't exactly want to expand on the flip-side of that.

"I got some horrible memories from the series, as well," he said.

When asked to elaborate on those memories, he politely said, "No thanks."

Perhaps what crossed his mind was the 16-3 beat-down his team suffered last season at the Carrier Dome or the 22-game losing streak – of which Cannella was the head coach of 10 of them – UMass endured against Syracuse from 1982-2003.

But the great thing about rivalries is that none of those games truly matter come Saturday when UMass and Syracuse meet at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. It's a brand-new year. And UMass is a much different team this season than it was in 2008. But with both teams smack dab in the race for the national championship, it'll be the same motivation driving these teams this weekend.

While the expected crowd of over 10,000 people, the media and the players anxiously look ahead to the 36th clash between UMass and Syracuse, let's take a look back at some of their recent memorable encounters.

Ouch.

The Orange led 9-0 at halftime. Even with all of their backups in for the second half, they won by 13 – the third largest margin of victory in the history of the rivalry. It also tied for the lowest scoring output for UMass against Syracuse.

4/28/07: UMASS 9, SYRACUSE 7

With the victory, UMass essentially eliminated Syracuse from making the NCAA Tournament for the first time in 24 years. As an added bonus, it also made it impossible for the Orange to finish with a .500 record for the first time in 31 years.

"I specifically remember Brian Jacovina running the clock out with under two minutes and he drew three fouls – he was carrying the ball and he was literally running circles around the cage with three guys hitting him," Rory Pedrick recalled.

The game wasn't anything special, especially not for UMass.

But the Minutemen got the last laugh, making it all the way to the NCAA national championship game. UMass won four straight games after the loss to the Orange before finally falling to Virginia in the title game.

5/15/05: UMASS 16, SYRACUSE 15 (NCAAS)

All-American Sean Morris scored the game-winning goal with just over a minute remaining to end one of the most impressive runs in the history of sports.

Syracuse had reached the Final Four for 22 straight years dating back to 1981. But UMass put an end to that behind six goals from Jeff Zywicki.

Adding to the hysteria following the win, Zywicki did a somersault in celebration right in front of the Syracuse bench – exacting revenge on former Orange star Mike Powell, who pulled the same trick in front of the Minutemen in Syracuse's win the year before.

4/30/05: UMASS 14, SYRACUSE 13 (OT)

Zywicki loved to play Syracuse.

He scored the game-winner just 50 seconds into the overtime session in a memorable meeting at Garber Field that precipitated the Minutemen's NCAA victory two weeks later.

4/26/03: UMASS 14, SYRACUSE 13 (OT)

Zywicki! In a precursor of what was to come in his career against Syracuse, he scored the game-winner in overtime.

Not only was it a thriller in the pouring rain, but it snapped a 22-game win streak for Syracuse over UMass.

RIVALRY NOTES

The teams have met at least once every year since the rivalry began in 1976 ... Syracuse leads the all-time series, 27-8. But UMass is 7-10 in games played in Amherst and won the first two meetings in '76 and '77. The Orange are 16-1 at home and 1-0 at a neutral site ... UMass won twice in 2005 and in 2007, 2003, 1981, 1979, 1977 and 1976. The Minutemen are a combined 75-27. In the seven seasons they beat Syracuse and made the NCAA Tournament in all but one of those seasons (2007) ... They have only met once in NCAA Tournament play (2005) ... Three games have gone to overtime (1996, 2003, 2005); UMass has taken the last two ... The highest-scoring meeting was in 1992, when UMass lost 25-12. That marked the most goals UMass has ever allowed in the 56-year history of the program ... Syracuse has outscored UMass 475-333 in the 35 all-time meetings. That translates to an average score of 13.6-9.5.

No longer the underdogs...

UM comes in as favorite this time in A-10 Tournament

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last year, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team played spoiler to top-seeded Richmond en route to an appearance in the Atlantic 10 Tournament championship game.

The Minutewomen are back at it again this year. However, it will be their turn to go in as the favorite as they face off against No. 4 seed George Washington Friday in Philadelphia, Pa.

Don't tell UMass coach Alexis Venechanos, though. Despite the team's seeding, Venechanos and her players still consider themselves the underdog.

"I think right now, we're going in a little wide-eyed and we definitely have an underdog mentality," Venechanos said. "We're probably going to be a little nervous in the beginning. But with the close games that we've had, playing against the national champions [Northwestern] and against Boston University, I think we have a strong foundation."

UMass comes in with a combination of youth and experience. Some players, like senior co-captain Jackie Rosenzweig, are entering their third conference tournament in four years. Others, like freshman standout goalkeeper Katie Florence, are entering postseason play for the first time.

"They're ready for it," Rosenzweig said of the freshmen on the team. "They've progressed a lot since the beginning of the season and they're ready. They've worked really hard and the five upperclassmen have all done a good job of making them feel like they're up for it."

Florence, who has started every game of her young career at UMass, has already evolved into one of the top goalies in the conference. She currently boasts a .472 save percentage, which is the third-best mark in the conference, and a 10.77 goals-against average, good for second in the A-10.

The Minutewomen (9-7, 6-1 A-10) enter the tournament after winning the regular season A-10 title for the first time since 2000 and tying for the best conference record in school history. UMass will take on the Colonials (5-11, 4-3 A-10), a team that it has already defeated earlier in the season, 18-5 on April 5.

The Colonials earned their bid into the conference tournament by winning when they had to. George Washington only has one non-conference win under their belt (a 14-5 win against Mt. Saint Mary's), but none of those other seven losses had any impact on the postseason. And, after starting off their conference slate 3-0,

Editor's note:

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

As a college student and a fan of newspapers, the advertising website Craigslist has me torn.

On the one hand, I've nabbed some pretty great cheap furniture, gotten concert tickets and sublet my apartment on Craigslist. However, since many classified ads have migrated to the Web, the site is one of several reasons to blame for the decline of print newspapers.

What Craigslist is not to blame for is the recent death of 26-year-old Julia Brisman.

On Monday, Quincy, Mass., resident Philip Markoff, a 23-year-old Boston University medical student, was arrested for allegedly shooting and killing Brisman at the Marriott Copley Place Hotel in Boston on April 14.

Brisman, a masseuse, advertised her services on Craigslist, which is how the pair met up.

Since the incident gained national attention it has spurred a debate of whether or not Craigslist is somewhat responsible for allowing the Brisman and Markoff to connect in the first place.

According to an article in yesterday's Boston Globe, Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said during a press conference that the online company should take more control over illegal activity posted on its site.

If Craigslist had blocked Brisman's ad because it somehow was illegal or violated the site's policy, would she and her alleged killer have ever met up?

Probably not. But if it wasn't her, it likely would have been someone else.

It's sad to say but if someone really has a motivation to kill someone, they're likely going to find a way to do so. Murders came long before the Internet and long before Craigslist.

When you arrange to meet up with some person you discovered from an online advertisement you never know who exactly will show up. Often, it's just some guy who bought a new couch and wants you to take his old, beat-up one the hell out of his living room.

However, there's always a risk, and that risk is something the two parties who are arranging to meet – not the medium allowing them to connect – should be wary of and responsible for.

Whether it's a newspaper ad, a phone call, a text message, instant message or any other form of communication, you should have some idea of who is on the other end before you decide to meet up with them in a hotel room. If you don't, bring a friend or at least have an exit plan.

Craigslist provides a valuable service by allowing millions of people to conveniently connect and find jobs, places to live and opportunities to trade a bunch of useless junk.

The site's CEO Jim Buckmaster told CNN on Wednesday that the company feels "terribly" that Craigslist was the method allegedly used for Markoff to find his victim.

And the site should feel bad because Brisman's death is certainly a sad circumstance, but they shouldn't feel responsible – they did not kill her.

Similarly, they should not feel at fault for newspapers shutting down across the country because Craigslist is not killing newspapers, it is merely a creative business idea that happens to be out-competing print publications for classified advertising – but they should feel "terribly."

McDonald's on the offensive

By Mike Hughlett
McClatchy Newspapers

CHICAGO — Don Thompson is a man of science, an electrical engineer who once designed radar jamming systems, but recently, his biggest problem was a simple piece of cheese.

McDonald's most popular U.S. sandwich, its $1 double cheeseburger, was barely profitable for its franchisees. And as head of McDonald's U.S. operations, it was Thompson's job to find a solution that wouldn't alienate cash-strapped consumers.

The answer: Raise the double cheeseburger's price to $1.19, but also launch a new double cheeseburger, with less cheese, for $1.

The great cheeseburger compromise appears to have worked, and it's exactly the type of innovation that has kept Oak Brook, Ill.-based McDonald's Corp. on a roll, despite an ugly economy, analysts said.

Now, the 46-year-old Thompson has an even bigger challenge: Successfully completing the rollout of one of the fast-food giant's biggest – and riskiest – U.S. product launches, the McCafe specialty coffee offensive.

"This is a big deal and all eyes are on McDonald's," said Steve West, an analyst at Stifel Nicolaus. "If it fails, it will be an embarrassment and will fall right at (Thompson's) feet. It's not his idea, but it is his to execute. He could live or die by that sword."

Thompson notes that the coffee blitz is only a part, albeit a big one, of McDonald's U.S. strategy. But one thing is certain: When Thompson graduated from college in 1984, he couldn't envision he would one day be figuring ways to peddle caramel cappuccino.

Growing up in Indianapolis, he had been attracted to engineering. "In eighth grade, my math and science was always pretty good," he said. So Thompson signed up for a summer engineering program at Purdue University aimed at lower-income students. He got hooked.

MCT

McDonald's CEO Don Thompson worked for the engineering giant Bell Labs before taking his current position. He is working now on keeping McDonald's afloat in a difficult economy.

Eventually he would earn a degree in electrical engineering from Purdue, and then land a job in the Chicago-area office of defense contractor Northrop Corp. It was a homecoming of sorts.

Thompson had lived on Chicago's near North Side until 6th grade, when his revered grandmother, who raised him, moved to Indianapolis. "As my grandmother would tell it, 'We moved so you would not succumb to certain influences,'" he said. The neighborhood was getting rougher. "I guess she had some concerns I might be a knucklehead."

At Northrop, Thompson designed radar jamming systems for fighter planes. One day in 1990, he got an unsolicited call from a recruiter for a job involving robotics. Thompson was intrigued – until he realized the pitch came from McDonald's, not defense contractor McDonnell Douglas.

"Imagine now, someone calling me up, six years after being in the defense industry, saying, 'Would you like to come and work for a hamburger company?' My comment back was, 'Maybe you've got the wrong guy.'"

But after chatting with a McDonald's engineer who once worked for Bell Labs, a citadel of engineering excellence, Thompson accepted a job that year. After a few years in McDonald's engineering department, he switched to restaurant operations, then steadily worked his way up the management ranks.

In August 2006, Thompson was named president of McDonald's USA, which makes up 34 percent of revenues, a little less than Europe, but still is the greatest source of operating earnings, at 48 percent.

Conditions right for large turnout

This Saturday, the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC) will host the 18th annual Extravaganja festival on the Amherst town commons.

The highly anticipated event will include a number of musical performances as well as political speakers advocating marijuana legalization. There will also be a number of food and other vendors, contests and puppet shows. In the past, the event has attracted over 2,000 people.

The festival is one of the largest marijuana advocacy gatherings in New England. What sets Extravaganja apart from other similar festivals has traditionally been the environment where people can enjoy the musical performances and smoke freely on the town commons.

Although the Amherst Police Department has made no official statement regarding their involvement, the general consensus from third parties is that they turn the other cheek. Heather McCormack, president of the Cannabis Reform Coalition at UMass, said that they have always had an understanding with the Amherst Police regarding Extravaganja.

"What the police want is a violence-free event, which we provide every year," said McCormack. "They also don't want a lot of anti-cop sentiment."

This year's Extravaganja marks the first year that attendees will be able to light up without the added threat of arrest, due to the November's approval of Proposition 2, which decriminalized marijuana in Massachusetts.

Alex Arsenault, treasurer of the CRC, said the new decriminalization law will make this year's festival different.

"I feel like the fear and paranoia factor is going to be completely gone this year," said Arsenault. "Hopefully that means a lot more people will show up to the event."

Lt. Robert Young with the Amherst Police Department insisted that there are no outside agreements with the CRC to allow smoking on the town commons.

"We do not have the ability to make an agreement with anyone to violate the law," said Young. "Even though marijuana possession has been decriminalized, it is not lawful to possess or sell."

Although the festival is primarily geared towards pot-smokers and advocates of legalization, it has been a major attraction due to the eclectic lineup of musical performances as well. The wide assortment of local bands will feature genres ranging from hip-hip to reggae and rock to punk music.

"It's just jam-packed with awesomeness this year," said McCormack, who will be hosting the event with her own band, Solo Sexx.

Last year's festival drew over a crowd of over 2,000, who packed into the confines of Amherst's town commons. With Saturday's forecast projecting sunny skies and temperatures in the high 80s, this year's festival is primed to set new records.

Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano can be reached at steinber@student.umass.edu

Last year Extravaganja drew a crowd of around 2,000 people. The combination of good weather and the recent decriminalization of marijuana may produce even larger crowds this year.

Smaller missiles being tested for use in modern warfare

By Peter Pae
Los Angeles Times

CHINA LAKE, Calif. — A 5-pound missile the size of a loaf of French bread is being quietly tested in the Mojave Desert north of Los Angeles as the military searches for more deadly and far more precise robotic weapons for modern warfare.

In the next month or so, researchers at the Naval Air Warfare Center at China Lake expect to test a 2-foot-long Spike missile that is about a "quarter of the size of the next smallest on the planet," said Steve Felix, the missile project's manager.

Initially intended for use by ground troops against tanks, these small guided missiles have been reconfigured to launch from unmanned airplanes to destroy small vehicles. In the test, the missile will be fired from a remote-controlled helicopter and aimed at a moving pickup truck.

If the test is successful, it will mark another milestone in the development of weapons for unmanned aircraft, a nascent field reminiscent of the early days of flight nearly a century ago when propeller-driven biplanes were jury-rigged with machine guns.

In recent months, the U.S. has used Predator robotic planes equipped with video cameras to carry out search-and-destroy missions against al-Qaida hide-outs in Pakistan and Afghanistan. These attacks highlighted the rapidly changing face of warfare. But it was no big deal at China Lake, where weapons have been getting smaller, more precise and more powerful for a decade.

The new missiles being developed here are minuscule compared with the older, 100-pound Hellfire missiles in use today in Central Asia. A Predator, which can carry two or three Hellfires, would be able to hold as many as a dozen Spikes, extending its capabilities.

At the same time, experts say, smaller unmanned planes that could not carry weapons before could become deadly attack aircraft.

It is just these kinds of new weapons that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates emphasized as he recently outlined one of the most sweeping shifts in military spending priorities in decades. Among his priorities were buying 50 more Predator planes and putting more money into armed unmanned aircraft.

"We must re-balance this department's programs in order to institutionalize and enhance our capabilities to fight the wars we are in today and the scenarios we are most likely to face in the years ahead," Gates said.

Engineers at the sprawling China Lake complex, one of the nation's largest weapons test facilities with 6,600 workers, are hoping to be at the forefront.

Pentagon officials say robotic planes have been particularly effective. As a result, demand for them has climbed sharply and Pentagon planners have rethought how they develop and deploy new weapon systems, analysts said.

ISB site for 'Molecular Playground'

By Sara Cody
Collegian Staff

Dr. Craig Martin, a chemistry professor at the University of Massachusetts, has recently been awarded a grant to create a larger-than-life interactive display he has dubbed the Molecular Playground.

The Camille and Henry Dreyfus Foundation awarded Martin a $45,000 special grant to construct the three-dimensional display in the lobby of the Integrated Sciences Building.

Martin will be collaborating with computer science emeritus professor Allen Hanson and microbiology emeritus professor Eric Martz to create colorful renditions of familiar molecules on a 6-by-9-foot wall.

"I hope that [people will] see molecules as real, three-dimensional structures and not abstract concepts," said Martin. "I don't expect anyone to get precise detail, but I want [the public] to get a feeling for molecules."

Students who have ever popped an ibuprofen at the onset of a headache, spritzed on perfume before going out to a party or drank coffee to help stay awake in their early morning classes will be able to explore molecules in these compounds that they come across every day.

The concept behind this display is that passersby will be able to walk up to the projection on the wall and physically explore the molecules. By using their hands to manipulate the projection, viewers will be able to control the movement, magnification and direction of the molecules.

Martin has been working with Hansen to coordinate the logistics of creating the display. Hansen will contribute to the project using his expertise with computers. By using an image processing algorithm, the camera and computers being used in the display will be able to detect when a person is actually interacting with the display as opposed to simply passing by.

Martin also plans on collaborating with Martz to generate the content of the exhibit. Martz's knowledge and experience with developing computer programs that allow people to explore molecules, particularly proteins, will be the source of the theme behind the display.

The inspiration behind this exhibit came from an interactive display Martin saw at Bradley International Airport. Martin decided that an artistic approach may be a different way to get the public to try and relate with molecules.

"[I] very much intend it to be artistic. Because it will capture people's imagination the way art does and that's great," said Martin. "The whole point is to capture people's imaginations and to attract them to it and then maybe they'll say 'Hey, maybe I'll take that chemistry course.'"

In the future, Martin plans on collaborating with UMass chemistry professor Paul Lahti on synching the display with the content that is being taught in the lecture halls. "Students getting out of class [across the hall from the display] will be able to walk over to this wall and play with the reactions that were just talked about in class," explained Martin.

The prospect has generated popular support among science students already.

"I think it's cool that it's interactive. Molecules are very difficult to understand," said Doug Taylor, a senior biology major at UMass. "I think it will make people who understand them appreciate them even more."

Eliminating SAT scores may increase college diversity

By Paige Kestenman
The Daily Princetonian

PRINCETON, N.J. — Eliminating standardized test scores as a factor in the college admissions process would lead to more racially and socioeconomically diverse undergraduate populations, according to a recent study by two university researchers.

Using data collected from 250,000 applications to 10 selective colleges and universities, sociology professor Thomas Espenshade GS '72 and Office of Population Research statistical programmer Chang Chung considered the effects of two possible admissions policies: "SAT optional" and "Don't Ask, Don't Tell."

The former refers to colleges that would look at standardized test scores when considering applications but would not require them. In this scenario, lower SAT scores would not be sent and thus would be ignored, while higher SAT scores would still matter. In the "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" scenario, admissions officers would not consider SAT scores for any student.

"Under both of these admission strategies, we find that there is certainly an increase in racial diversity on campus," Espenshade explained. "There is also an increase in socioeconomic diversity on campus."

The impact of SAT scores on lower-class applicants seems to be about the same as on minority students because of the high correlation between the demographic groups, Espenshade added.

"Effects on racial diversity are pretty much the same order of magnitude as the effect on socioeconomic diversity," he explained. "Black and Hispanic students tend to draw from lower-income communities."

Yet Espenshade added that though racial diversity is poised to increase at schools that instate SAT-optional policies, the impact on members of different racial minorities will vary.

"At private institutions, the increase in the rep resentation of black students might be slightly greater than the increase in the representation of Hispanic students, but both are going up a fair amount," he said.

Espenshade's results parallel earlier findings by fellow sociology professor Marta Tienda.

"Sigal Alon and I have established quite definitively that growing reliance on [the] SAT has generated need for affirmative action," Tienda explained in an e-mail.

High school grades are in fact more accurate predictors of college success, Tienda said, based on her study of schools in Texas that forego consideration of SAT scores. She found that minority students in the top 10 percent of their high school classes achieve greater academic success than their white peers who score 200-300 points higher on the SAT but are outside of the top 10 percent of their graduating class.

'Taste of UMass' fills Mullins Center

Students sample cuisine from different culinary traditions

University of Massachusetts hosted its annual "Taste of UMass" festivities in the Mullins Center, with famous personalities and cuisine from around the world.

This year, students were treated to visits from celebrity chef Martin Yan and Kevin Brauch from the Food Network. Red Sox mascot Wally the Green Monster was also in attendance. The event spanned from 4:30 p.m. to 8 p.m.

The event featured foods from tapas to sushi and dim sum, representing 15 different countries at 75 separate food booths, according to a UMass press release.

"It is one of the signature events of dining services where we have thousands of people come out and it's a wonderful way to showcase what Dining Services can offer, with its typical flair and a dose of excitement," said UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

Food will be cooked by chefs from UMass in addition to guests, all in small portions prepared mostly on the premises using local ingredients.

Yan and Brauch also judged the Student Iron Chef Contest, where students representing each of the four dining commons competed to make the most tantalizing dish.

The event was expected to draw around 8,000 students — in part because all dining commons on campus closed at 3 p.m.

There were a number of other events at the Mullins Center including a UMass Idol contest, with 13 qualifying students, a hot dog eating contest, a magic show, yo-yo demonstrations and appearances by New England Patriots' cheerleaders.

"Dining Services does very well in terms of delivering innovative products, good food for students and they make it fun. That's one of the reasons [people] show up in such great numbers," said Blaguszewski.

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fighting to regain our humanity

War steals our humanity. It takes the most cherished aspects of life from all of us – safety, family, friends, love and justice. It turns some of us into pilots and soldiers and puts others on water boards and in body bags. War justifies barbarism and gives meaning to modern killing machines.

The positive effects of war can only be found in the bank accounts of the rich and powerful. There's a vile crisis in the world when the largest and most profitable industry is in the mass slaughter of people. Whether you're an American, Iraqi, soldier, worker or student, in the end we've all become victims of war. We all bleed from the same wound. It is through the collective struggle against war that we can fight for our humanity back.

Tristan Brosnan

On May 15 last year, Sergeant Matthis Chiroux announced his refusal to deploy to Iraq in Washington, D.C. On the following Father's Day Sgt. Chiroux failed to report for duty. Instead, he gave a speech, recorded on his blog, calling the war and occupation in Iraq "an illegal, immoral war which is ripping this nation apart, as well causing immeasurable harm to the Iraqi people and the people of the world alike."

Chiroux is one of many soldiers and veterans who've refused to follow orders and refused to be silent about the war crimes being committed in Iraq and Afghanistan. Thousands of active duty service members and reservists have gone Absent Without Leave (AWOL) and a dozens, if not hundreds, have gone public with their opposition to the wars and their refusal to participate in them.

Following his refusal, Chiroux was sent a letter that gave him a general discharge informing him that he would retain all benefits, but he would also receive a charge of misconduct. Instead Sgt. Chiroux vowed to take on the U.S. military and said, "When I publicly refused service in Iraq as illegal I promised to stay in the states to fight all charges and that includes a misconduct charge that the army has leveled at me."

This past Tuesday, April 21, Sgt. Chiroux had an administrative hearing in St. Louis in which he received a general discharge under honorable conditions from the Individual Ready Reserve. The discharge was identical to the one he refused but is nonetheless a victory for a war resister who decided to fight the U.S. military on a principled, anti-war stance.

Sgt. Chiroux is part of a growing movement of anti-war veterans and soldiers in this country. He is a member of Iraq Veterans Against the War (IVAW), a national anti-war organization with thousands of members including both veterans and active duty soldiers in 48 states, Washington, D.C., Canada and on military bases overseas.

IVAW was modeled after the organization Vietnam Veterans Against the War, an anti-war veteran's organization that organized and protested against the war in Vietnam. Since its founding, IVAW has had three points of unity: immediate withdrawal of all occupying forces in Iraq, reparations for the Iraqi people and full benefits for all service members.

> Whether you're an American, Iraqi, soldier, worker or student, in the end we've all become victims of war. We all bleed from the same wound.

After Chiroux was honorably discharged from the IRR earlier this week he released a statement on his blog. His message was this: If you struggle against injustice you can win.

Chiroux took on the world's most powerful military and was able to win. His victory was individual and small in contrast to the size and scope of the military machine, but there should be little doubt that if he can do it, anyone can.

The Republicans and Democrats have failed the Iraqi, Afghani and American people. The election of President Barack Obama is an indication of the anti-war sentiment in this country, yet our political leaders have neglected to move on the overwhelming anti-war position of the American and Iraqi people.

This has meant that service members, workers and students will no longer be complacent with waiting for politicians to act. Instead, the end to the war and occupation of Iraq and Afghanistan will be realized through our own activity, the activity of students, workers and soldiers, here and in the Middle East.

GI resistance and rebellion has a long history. German and Russian soldiers abandoned their trenches en masse throughout World War I. On Christmas Eve in 1914 German and British soldiers laid down their arms for an unofficial truce along the Western Front. During Vietnam GIs organized anti-war coffee shops, newspapers and protests.

The history of antiwar activity by GIs and service members has been hidden from us. History is once again turning into reality and it will be the soldiers and civilians resisting today that will put an end to these wars.

The bonds of humanity cannot be undone by the slaughter of war. The resistance of veterans and active duty soldiers represents one of the greatest traditions of resistance to oppression. The struggle against war is a fight to win back our humanity.

Sgt. Chiroux, you've taken on Goliath and won, but the struggle against war and oppression is far from over.

Smile, you're getting paid overtime

For those of you acquainted with the experience, perhaps you too would liken Friday night bus-riding to the third circle of Dante's "Inferno," it rivals being packed like an anchovy into an oily, perfumed can of hell. The driver mans the wheel with his hemp bracelet and thrash metal CD, going so fast sometimes that you can't tell whether the screeches come from the tires or the squealing teen-queen next to you.

Evan Haddad

The whole bus smells like after-shave and cheap booze. But even if you had tasted something a little finer that evening – hell, even if you wore an Armani suit and Cervoodle skin boots – the blue Cerberus with the badge would still deal you the same dirty looks. All you can do is bite your lip and tell yourself that this is just part of the Divine Comedy.

It goes without saying that this past weekend opened my eyes to some real issues boiling beneath the surface of our beloved school bus system.

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) is the quintessential policy-creation of the 70s. Founded in 1974 in response to Massachusetts general transportation laws, PVTA has lauded itself well into the 21st century on being "the largest regional transit authority in Massachusetts with ... 24 participating member communities," according to their website.

To their credit, PVTA has consistently maintained both affordable and reliable accommodations for residents of Western Mass. But while public transportation has heralded much in the ways of "modernity" to otherwise sleepy mill towns of the Pioneer Valley, a ride or two will quickly offer you a sobering glimpse of its practices.

The operation here perhaps appears more dubious on those Friday nights, as both wheeler and wayfarer usually co-exist under one common occupation – namely, student.

Yet, it would be wrong to accuse student-drivers of supplementing the weekend mutinies which so casually unfold, stressful conditions will make even the best man roll over a few curbs and scrape a couple of cars sometimes – won't it? After all, we're only human.

> But couldn't the officers riding an empty bus to campus at 8 p.m at least uncross their arms, or keep vigil near the hot spots in town?

And besides, who alone could control hundreds of tipsy freshmen loaded on a bus? Or loaded freshmen on a tipsy bus? One thing is certain: UMass Transit's standards are just that: baffling.

Well, I will be honest – before last Friday, I maintained a faint hope that the campus police could. All those stories of billy-clubs and sand bag guns had enticed my imagination, but where were they to be found when you needed them?

Maybe the budget cuts have even taken their toll on the police force, and now all they've got is the left over chili powder from the dining commons (which I am told is not chili powder at all but some bizarre artificial tincture). Who knows?

My companion that night proceeded to explain in his slurred speech that these safety officers are compensated with "overtime" wages for bus duty. Simply put: They rake in double time dough while riding the buses Friday and Saturday night. I'm no judge, but it seemed like a pretty facile gig, too.

On the ride home, however, the officer got a little nasty, he held up the bus several times by refusing to pack in with the rest of the passengers. To his mind, he was damned if he was going to be pressed against the door with boozy students; everyone else had better squish closer together and give him enough room.

I felt bad for the old ladies who must have been steaming like clams on that chockablock ride.

I had the displeasure of standing near the front door next to the officer. At each stop we both piled out to allow passengers to disembark. And at each stop he puffed out a snide remark like it was his chest. All in all, it was a pretty sad display.

So far as I know, nobody was arrested or compelled to hide their nefarious behavior. The officer seemed too busy trying to look stone cold to have noticed anything.

The following morning, I sent out an e-mail to the supervisor of the UMass Transit. I asked to know the number and type of crimes reported on local buses each semester, and the number of arrests. While the UMass Police Department's comprehensive website provides general statistics for a year's worth of crime, I was unable to locate the information I desired.

Nearly a week later, I still haven't been graced with a response.

To be fair, I realize that the officers who patrol these parts don't have the easiest crowd to deal with on a Friday evening. I realize that arresting students left and right on a bus would be a serious breach of campus trust, too.

But couldn't the officers riding an empty bus to campus at 8 p.m at least uncross their arms, or keep vigil near the hot spots in town?

What does UMass Transit aim to do by sending overpaid officers to the end of the line on crowded buses? For the people going home who get jostled around by all this rough stuff, it's an insult.

UMass training will help knock out recession woes

Michael Phillis

My brother has almost completed his first year at the University of Delaware.

After a five and a half hour drive from the University of Massachusetts once a semester, I arrive at the town of Newark, the home of my brother's school, Newark, Del., and UDel itself mistakenly demonstrate some of the great, problematic contrasts in America. Newark is a microcosm of what is happening on a much larger scale around the country, demonstrating a problem that is especially important for college students looking for jobs.

First, it's important to paint the picture of the UDel grounds.

Briefly stated, UDel's classically collegiate atmosphere of small brick buildings and beautiful, flawless landscaping make the look of my brother's school all you could want in a college campus.

Well-kept brick buildings are abundantly placed across campus. Just a half-mile away from the center of UDel's perfectly groomed grass fields there are a few bars, a couple of nice breakfast joints and enough UDel culture to safely call this part of Newark a great college town.

> Unlike so many others – smaller schools that coddle and coach their students through their four undergraduate years – UMass students have always been allowed to make their own mistakes with little or no safety net in place for a do-over.

A shut-down General Motors plant sits less than a mile away from this picturesque campus in the opposite direction of Main Street.

UDel seems to inhabit another world from that of the year-round residents of Newark who relied largely on the GM factory to support themselves and their families.

My brother, Zachary, has earned the right to attend a great school like UDel but the people in Newark are in much worse shape then the students that live on campus.

There are reasons that a school of rich college kids is mostly ambivalent to the pains facing those who live so close by. Bill Clinton's support of his treasury secretary, Robert Rubin, and the former head of the Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan, started a lot of what caused the current financial crisis.

As the country watched regulations fall to the wayside, the foundations for a financial collapse were being poured.

Wealth in America has trickled up since the late '60s from the middle class to those who make the most. The increased separation of wealth has resulted in many Americans fitting into two categories, the wannabe middle class (former GM employees in Newark) and the upper class (the UDel student body).

UMass is in a different situation than that of my brother's school. There is no GM plant here to support a large, working middle-class citizenry. There are minimum-wage jobs at retail stores in Hadley, Mass., some small businesses as well as UMass professors and staff.

Those who are ready to graduate and those of us who will be here next year need jobs. Unfortunately, college students are finding themselves in a trying situation.

Friends of mine who are graduating with high GPAs and impressive resumes are still clueless about what their future will bring, no matter how many applications they have sent out.

So what kind of world are we entering into after UMass? Will our future look more like the pleasant life of a college student or will it more closely resemble the citizens of Newark, Del.? It's hard to say – a lot depends on how the economic situation changes in the next year.

As a journalism major, I'm scared. I don't have the ability to call up someone I know in the industry and get myself a job upon graduation; a situation that is probably familiar to most other students on campus.

So what is there to do? The first thing that comes to mind is the importance of being conscious that what's outside the walls of UMass life is going to be hard for a while. The crummy jobs I've held in retail outlets have pushed me to work harder in school so that I would never have to go back to stocking shelves and dealing with customers again.

Then again, there has traditionally been great opportunity for entrepreneurship in bad economic times. UMass students are naturally good at this as they have had to find their own way through this school from the time they walked in the door.

That is what our advantage will be as UMass graduates. Unlike so many others – smaller schools that coddle and coach their students through their four undergraduate years – UMass students have always been allowed to make their own mistakes with little or no safety net in place for a do-over.

A UMass student knows how to figure out how to get through and we've always been even better at this with each other's help. Advisers are in place to assist with job placement here – they have been quite helpful for me. Use them.

Now is the time to use the self-preservation skills UMass taught us. The recession will end, jobs will pick up again and hopefully when I graduate, print journalism will still be alive.

If we've made it through UMass with so little guidance and room for error, then at least we're more prepared than most to weather the current storm.

Soon, the clouds must clear.

Hail the high-speed rail

Eli Gottlieb

How would you like to take a spring break to Florida with your own car, without ever getting on an airplane and without having to drive for several days there and back? Instead, you could drink and party on the way there and back. Your trip would use fewer natural resources than an airplane or car, and would compete with the price with flying. It would also take a bit longer, but in exchange you would travel in comfort and never have to go through an airport.

As much as that sounds like a snake-oil advertisement for hovercrafts, teleportation or monorails, President Obama's plans for high-speed rail could give us all that.

So to learn about the proposal, let's start with the definition of a high-speed rail according to the Federal Railroad Administration. A train that goes at least 90 miles per hour.

Secondly, President Obama's proposal covers an interstate rail running at the stated speed in many different corridors.

The proposal extends the existing Northeast Corridor run by Amtrak from Boston to Washington, D.C. through New York City with high-speed rail throughout New England, Pennsylvania and upstate New York. Then it adds a Southeast Corridor running from Washington D.C. down through Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia and Florida – getting us from Boston, Western Massachusetts, New York State or New Jersey down through Washington to Northern Florida solely by high-speed rail.

> We will have to subsidize rail travel enough to keep it price-competitive with automobile and air travel, or stop subsidizing automobile and air travel with constant bailouts.

Florida will have its own high-speed rails connecting the cities of middle and southern Florida, and connected to the Southeast Corridor by existing passenger rail. The Southeast Corridor connects to a Gulf Coast corridor that goes through Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana.

From there the high-speed system can take us to Texas, which will have its own statewide high-speed system.

Or perhaps we wanted to visit our cousins in Chicago.

To do that, we would get on the train wherever we live and go through the Northeast Corridor to the Empire Corridor crossing New York State from east to west or the Keystone Corridor across Pennsylvania. From there we would take existing, slow passenger rail for a relatively short distance to reach the Chicago Hub Network of high-speed trains.

With all this we'll only really need airplanes to cross the West and reach the Pacific Northwest Corridor in Washington State and Oregon or the California Corridor (the one Californians voted to fund last election) that will link the San Francisco area with the Los Angeles area and the southern border of California.

Actually, existing transcontinental passenger rail will allow us to reach one of those from Chicago or Texas, but at that point planes just make sense.

Admittedly, building this system will take a lot of effort and some systemic reforms. For example, we have to stop the government from killing rail transit by subsidizing the road system and auto companies that can't build a car people actually want to buy. We also need to stop requiring that Amtrak run at a profit.

Passenger rail runs as a public service everywhere it works and never makes a profit, because to build enough capacity for peak loads (like rush hours or holiday travel) means losing money on unfilled capacity during times of lower demand. So we will have to subsidize rail travel enough to keep it price-competitive with automobile and air travel, or stop subsidizing automobile and air travel with constant bailouts.

On the positive side, we could fund the rail system by taxing the fossil-fuel consumption of cars and planes that keeps our nation addicted to oil and beholden to dictators like "President" Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, "Supreme Leader" Ali Khamenei of Iran, and the "Royal" House of Saud.

We could take that money and pour it into building upgraded, more durable rail tracks that will work at higher speeds (dilapidated tracks mean that the high-speed Acela trains of today's Amtrak can't run at full speed anywhere north of New York City) and an infrastructure for clean electricity (including nuclear power and research into nuclear fusion) that will power our high-speed rail travel.

So let's sum up what we now know about President Obama's high-speed rail proposal. It will get us from school to our spring break vacation (or anywhere else halfway across the country or closer) at a price competitive with air travel, but with greater comfort, greater convenience, the ability to party on the way there and the ability to ship your car with you (on existing long-distance passenger rail).

It will create jobs in building the infrastructure (laborers, managers, engineers), and with proper policies can help us kick our addiction to paying our enemies for natural resources which will also create research jobs.

It will cost us, but we can manage if we shift our socialism from socialism for large corporations and the rich to socialism for everyone.

All in all, this seems one of the few political proposals I can call unadulterated good. Let's get it done so future generations of college students only have to sober up from spring break as they draw into their home station.

Statham electrifies in sequel

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

Ever wonder what happens after a bullet pierces through a silicone breast implant? How about what it would look like, up close, to see a man slice off his own nipples?

Or who knows? Maybe you've always been curious about what would happen if the porn industry went on strike in Los Angeles. Would it be anarchy, or would it just be unsettling to see Ron Jeremy outside an office wielding a picket sign?

"Crank: High Voltage" satisfies these oddball curiosities and gives its audience plenty more to gnaw on, as cartoonish violence and T&A galore bombard the screen in this follow-up to the 2006 original, "Crank."

What MacGuffin leads the plot this time? After surviving a perilous fall from a helicopter at the end of "Crank," hit man Chev Chelios (Jason Statham) awakes to find that his prized heart (or "strawberry tart," as he calls it) has been transplanted into the body of a geriatric gangster (David Carradine). In its stead, he's been given an electric model that's quickly running low on battery power. If Chelios wants to stay alive, he's got to find creative ways to kick start his heart – and fast.

Statham, the heart and soul of the "Crank" franchise, returns for another bout of shoot-em-up mayhem in "High Voltage." Statham has cut his teeth on such action-packed enterprises as "The Bank Job" (2008) and "The Transporter" series, and he's got the scowl to prove it.

In "Crank: High Voltage," he treads the streets of Los Angeles once more, in search of any means available – tasers, car lighters and jumper cables – to help keep his heart pumping. And if it means humping the occasional old lady or his girlfriend Eve (Amy Smart) in public, so be it. Chelios has been down this path before and knows the rules.

And come to think of it, so have the creators of the "Crank" franchise.

Writer-directors Mark Neveldine and Brian Taylor, who also did the original, haven't tweaked the premise much between each film. "Crank: High Voltage" is every bit the 13-year-old boy's fantasy that the original was, and like its predecessor, "High Voltage" doesn't straddle the line between good and bad taste – it leaps full throttle over to the dark side.

Feasting on all the unremittingly amoral, sexed-up scenarios they've clustered together, Neveldine and Taylor show off their love of excess at every available bend. Besides arming girls with guns and gangsters with eerie fetishes, they give into a few other base desires in "High Voltage." Having Chelios and a thug duke it out, "Godzilla vs. Mothra" style, isn't nearly as ridiculous as what Chelios does to an enemy with a lubricated shot gun, but it comes close.

Neveldine and Taylor also utilize dizzying jump-cuts throughout, which lends to the film's feverish vibe.

With material like this, director Quentin Tarantino probably could have spun "High Voltage" into pure gold. But in the less-nimble hands of Neveldine and Taylor, the outlandish scenes offered in "Crank: High Voltage" occasionally turn crass. Witness the extended scene of Chelios plowing Eve across an open horse track before a crowd of onlookers – the scene is amusing, for a moment, but lasts longer than it needs to. And by the time a mysteriously reanimated head starts mumbling into the screen, you know the film has gone off the deep end.

Jason Statham returns to the big screen as hit man Chev Chelios in the sequel to the 2006 action thriller, "Crank."

At its best, "Crank: High Voltage" is a lot of fun to watch – too much fun, in fact, to be seen as a serious dig against those it threatens to offend. The film's rampant violence and sexist overtones will unnerve more squeamish viewers. Yet while "Crank: High Voltage" is guilty of committing a few misdemeanors against the P.C. police, the film doesn't hold itself up to be a serious microcosm of society, and shouldn't be seen as such.

Like Chelios, "High Voltage" stays on the move, but it's sort of like moving on a treadmill – the plot never really changes in its course, and the more frenzied and outlandish it becomes, the more it starts to feel like the film is just running in place.

Even so, "Crank: High Voltage" delivers the kind of electric jolt to its audience that is sure to keep them buzzing for more. And Jason Statham, as our generation's answer to stars like Steven Seagal ("Under Siege") and Jean-Claude Van Damme ("Timecop"), seems like the perfect face to steer a franchise that grows crazier and crazier with each subsequent installment.

The UMass Renaissance Center Theater Company is currently performing "The Merry Wives of Windsor" in celebration of the tenth anniversary of the Renaissance Center.

Shakespeare on display

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Center for Renaissance Studies is in the midst of celebrating a year of Shakespeare and its own tenth anniversary. As part of the celebration, the Renaissance Center Theater Company will be performing Shakespeare's comedy "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

"The Merry Wives of Windsor" centers around Sir John Falstaff, a comic character that appears in two other Shakespeare plays: "Henry IV, Part I" and "Henry IV, Part 2." In the Henry IV plays Falstaff acts as confidant to Prince Hal.

"'Merry Wives' is an unusual play for Shakespeare," said director Ann Garner. "It's written mostly in prose, not blank verse, and it's a city comedy, his only one as far as we know.

"City comedy takes place in London and satirizes city life and city 'characters' like foolish gallants (fops) and greedy tradesmen," Garner continued. "It was a very popular genre among Shakespeare's contemporaries, although because Shakespeare has only this one it doesn't tend to be a very well-known genre for a modern audience and that's a bit of a shame because there are real gems in the city comedy genre."

It has been said that Queen Elizabeth so loved the character of Falstaff from the Henry IV plays that she requested an entire play based around the character. This may or may not be true, but in "Merry Wives" Falstaff moves from the 15th century setting of "Henry IV, Part 1" to what was then a contemporary 17th century setting.

Many critics believe the Falstaff of "Merry Wives" is inferior to the Falstaff of the Henry IV plays and have called "Merry Wives" a weak play because of its characterization. It is likely because of this negative criticism that "Merry Wives" is little produced, but that seems to be what drew Garner and the Center to the play.

"I gravitate toward the plays that tend to be a little less well-known," she said. "And I think, when we were planning, I had just read 'Merry Wives' and thought it was so funny and rarely produced, compared to Shakespeare's other plays. So it seemed like the right fit."

The Renaissance Center Theater Company began performances last week, with shows on April 17, 18, and 19.

About those performances Garner said, "I'm very pleased with last weekend's performances – and I think audiences were too. One of the great (and nerve-wracking) things about theater is that every performance is a little different."

So while it's difficult to tell how the coming weekend's performances will be based off last weekend, Garner said, "I expect it to be equally good, but just in different ways."

This is Garner's first time working with most of the actors, who include Steve Kallaugher as Falstaff; Brooke Steinhauser and Emily List as merry wives Mistress Ford and Mistress Page, respectively; Brittany Fitzgibbon as Mistress Quickly; Walter Carroll as Doctor Caius; as well as Gregory Kleciak, Rory Johnson, Emily Cordes, and Tom Gostanian.

Many of the actors are local and have worked together before. Steinhauser and List, for example, have both been involved with the Hampshire Shakespeare Company, and Gostanian is a University of Massachusetts student.

Garner herself is currently attending UMass. She is a graduate student studying Renaissance Drama in UMass' English department. While Garner said that she would direct any dramatic work that interested her, she noted, "There just seems to be a lot of Shakespeare in my life right now."

The first play Garner directed was "a full-scale, student-written, original operetta about the bloodiest battle in the Civil War, Antietam." Like Steinhauser and List, Garner has been involved with the Hampshire Shakespeare Company. For their production of "Romeo and Juliet" last summer Garner worked as dramaturge/assistant director, and she will be directing "Henry IV, Part 1" for them this summer.

The Renaissance Center Theater Company's second weekend of performances of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" starts today, April 24, at 7:30 p.m.

"This play is very funny ... Not just funny in an academic kind of way, but legitimately funny," said Garner. "The comedy translates well for a modern audience, I think. You won't break your brain seeing this play, but it is a good time."

"The Merry Wives of Windsor" will be performed April 24 and 25 at 7:30 p.m. and April 26 at 2 p.m. All performances will be held at the Renaissance Center at 650 East Pleasant St., Amherst. Tickets are $10 for students and seniors and $15 general admission. For reservations and information call 413-577-3600.

Talking Ponytail

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

Baltimore quartet Ponytail kick off their first ever headlining U.S. tour April 23 in Washington, D.C., and will make a stop at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton Sunday night with New York's Pains of Being Pure at Heart opening. The band incorporates searing, repetitious guitar, rolling drums and singer Molly Siegel's unparalleled squawk into a whirlwind of kaleidoscopic punk rock. In an exclusive interview with The Daily Collegian, Ponytail guitarist Ken Seeno spoke about the tour, new music, their collaborative recording tendencies and the painting class that got them all together in the first place.

Daily Collegian: So your first headlining tour starts tonight. How's that feel?

Ken Seeno: Well, we're playing in D.C. so we can go home and sleep, so the tour actually starts tomorrow.

DC: Who are you going to be playing with?

KS: We're playing a lot of shows with this band Talk About Life. We were going to play with Marnie Stern but that changed ... we're playing with the Vivian Girls in Kansas City.

DC: So this Pains of Being Pure at Heart show is a one-off thing?

KS: Yeah, I didn't even know we were playing with them until recently. I've only heard small clips of their songs.

DC: Are you hitting spots on the tour that you didn't get to on previous tours?

KS: We're going to Atlanta which we didn't get to before, that's going to be fun. It's going to be good going back where people have seen us before and see people we know. I'm excited to go to Portland and San Francisco, you know, all those good west coast cities.

DC: I know in interviews a lot of bands will say they don't listen to any new music when they're asked what their favorite record of last year was, but living in Baltimore that must not be the case with all the bands coming out of there recently. What's some of your favorite stuff to come out of Baltimore recently?

KS: Beach House. I really like them. They're about to have the same management as us. Ecstatic Sunshine's new record sounds awesome. This band Thank You is really good. We've been trying to set up shows with them but it's not working. White Williams has been around Baltimore recording. A lot of bands haven't been playing as many shows or are away a lot, like Dan Deacon.

Shelbourne Falls to host NoHo locals

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Northampton's own Winterpills will perform at Memorial Hall in Shelburne Falls this Saturday, Apr. 25 at 7 p.m.

The upcoming performance is the fourth annual benefit concert for the Academy at Charlemont, a private elementary and high school in Western Mass. The evening will also feature the Freightshakers, a bluegrass band from the Academy.

Winterpills have been producing their signature blend of folk and chamber pop since they were formed in 2003 by co-lead singer Philip Price.

Formally of power pop band The Maggies, Price sought a softer sound with his new band, creating the lilting harmonies and moving melodies that make up Winterpills.

Their self-titled debut, which was released the following year, made waves in the independent music scene, both locally and nationally. Their sophomore effort, "The Light Divides," was recognized in the top 100 albums on both iTunes and Amazon.com.

Since October 2008, the band has been touring in support of "Central Chambers," which has met with wild success. The new material was even showcased in a live set on National Public Radio.

This album is their third on Signature Sounds, an independent label that is home to such acts as Josh Ritter and Erin Mckeown.

"Central Chambers" has spelled big changes for the band. While the distinctive songwriting and harmonies have been kept intact, they have developed a much more polished sound.

Incorporating everything from singing saw to synthesizer, the band creates tunes that are palatable to a wide variety of listeners.

With the new release, the folk-rockers remain as artful and tasteful as ever. The delicate vocals of Flora Reed are forever in compliment to Price's quietly confident poetics. These harmonies provide the foundation for the majority of the Winterpills' repertoire.

Within this formula for melodic masterworks, however, lies much room for exploration. The album contains songs that range from the upbeat pop of the single "Take Away the Words," to the brooding folk of "Gentleman Farmer."

Between these extremes are songs like "Beesting," which showcases the band's innovative side. The track features distorted guitars and a uniquely vintage sound quality that takes the band in an entirely new direction.

Much of the lyrical innovations on the new record have come from Price's experiences of late.

The album's title carries several levels of significance as well. "Central Chambers" is the name of an establishment just outside of Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall where the band used to practice. The title is also a reference to the heart, a topic that is particularly poignant to Price.

For the past several years, the artist has been dealing with a heart condition that has greatly influenced both his lifestyle and songwriting. Making the best of his situation, however, the songwriter produces graceful tunes that celebrate the beautiful side of life.

Northampton locals Winterpills will perform in Shelbourne Falls Saturday as part of the fourth annual benefit concert for the Academy at Charlemont.

The event on Saturday will not just include songs from "Central Chambers," however. According to the band's website, they intend to play an extended show, reaching deep into the pockets of their song catalogue.

The website also reveals that, "a really fun thing will happen: there will be a full band and teenage chorus version of a Winterpills song played that night. That's all we are saying."

In addition to these perks, the band is already well-renowned for their breath-taking live performances.

This will be the band's second time performing in scenic Shelburne Falls. The venue's rustic quality is well suited to the Winterpill's walk-in-the-woods sound.

Tickets for the event are $10 for students and seniors and $15 for adults.

Guitarist talks tour, recording

your first album (2006's "Kamehamcha"), how did you go into recording "Ice Cream Spiritual?"

KS: The first record we recorded at home in one day so our goal for the new one was to record a real record, actually go into the studio and have someone who's experienced work with us. We had been recording everything live, and we wanted to keep that sound. We recorded at Jay Robbins' studio in Baltimore. It was a really good experience – the product was more of a baby with all the work we put into it. We came in totally prepared and ready to go, blocked out everything, and just went on a straight line for a week.

DC: Do you have plans after this tour to get back into the studio?

KS: This summer we'd like to work on our next record, or at least write new music. It's really hard when you're playing shows just to put everything down and start from scratch.

DC: How do you write songs?

KS: It's definitely a collaborative process. We've never written a whole song without everybody being there. We need everybody in a room, everybody's input. We try not to tell each other what to do. It's a lot to do with the four of us.

DC: Since you never write Ponytail songs individually do you guys have any solo projects or other material you work on?

KS: Dustin just finished his solo record, it's out on vinyl. He's been working on it for years. It's a magical sort of record, not like Ponytail at all. Molly has been working on some stuff in New York. We like to explore ideas on our own, but we put all our energy into Ponytail. We're focused on Ponytail.

DC: Your MySpace page says the band formed as a class project. Is this true?

KS: Yes, when I was a freshman at the Maryland Institute College of Art (MICA) in January 2005 we all took this "parapainting" class. The goal of the class was to have a band ... the professor put the bands together on first impressions, like "you guys sound grunge so you can be in a grunge band."

DC: So you were all put together randomly. You didn't know each other?

KS: Yeah, he just put us together. We didn't know each other. I kind of knew Dustin – I remember seeing him and thinking he was real cool. He had these capris on, you know the pants. Three quarter length? I just remember thinking he had cool style. And he had this weird bowl cut. I actually convinced Dustin to join the class so I wasn't the only freshman. And Molly was so weird.

NFL Mock Draft

Nicolas O'Malley

1. Detroit Lions
Pick: Matthew Stafford – Quarterback, Georgia
Many experts have Stafford as a gun-slinger that could burn out quickly, especially with a bad team – the Lions are a bad team. Plus, they're already reportedly in talks with him. 0-32?

2. St. Louis Rams
Pick: Jason Smith – Offensive Tackle, Baylor
O-lineman. Yay.

3. Kansas City Chiefs
Pick: Aaron Curry – Linebacker, Wake Forest
Former Patriots draft guru Scott Pioli knows to take the best player available, which is Curry.

4. Seattle Seahawks
Pick: Eugene Monroe – OT, Virginia
Offensive linemen are some of the surer picks in the draft. Even Robert Gallery, one of the most disappointing lineman picks in recent memory, still has a job.

5. Cleveland Browns
Pick: Brian Orakpo – Defensive End/Outside Linebacker, Texas
Last year, Cleveland was awful at rushing the passer. Awful.

6. Cincinnati Bengals
Pick: Andre Smith – OT, Alabama
A talented, but lazy player with attitude problems that will most likely get arrested before his career's over? Who else but the Bengals?

7. Oakland Raiders
Pick: Jeremy Maclin – WR, Missouri
Michael Crabtree is the best wide receiver in this draft and everyone knows it – except Al Davis, who loves the fact that Maclin's slightly faster.

8. Jacksonville Jaguars
Pick: Michael Crabtree – WR, Texas Tech
Did you read the last pick?

9. Green Bay Packers
Pick: Tyson Jackson – DE, LSU
Jackson, a 3-4 DE makes sense here, even though players like B.J. Raji have higher value.

10. San Francisco 49ers
Pick: Mark Sanchez – QB, USC
Sanchez needed another year. The 49ers need another highly touted college passer to underachieve for them.

11. Buffalo Bills
Pick: Everette Brown – DE, Florida State
The once-projected top 5 pick falls to the Bills because he is good but not that good.

12. Denver Broncos
Pick: B.J. Raji – Defensive Tackle, Boston College
Expected to be a Top 10 pick, Raji falls to the Broncos. Maybe he wouldn't have slipped if he didn't go to a school that sucked.

13. Washington Redskins
Pick: Michael Oher – OT, Ole Miss
Subject of the Michael Lewis book "Blind Side" (A really, really good book) and is inconsistent but has almost limitless potential. Owner Dan Snyder locks that.

14. New Orleans Saints
Pick: Brian Cushing – OLB, USC
The Saints defense has been awful for years. Cushing's a solid pick that will help to change that.

15. Houston Texans
Pick: Malcolm Jenkins – Cornerback, Ohio State
The best cornerback in the Big 10 since Charles Woodson, Jenkins is expected to have a good career. No one will pay attention, since no one likes the Texans.

16. San Diego Chargers
Pick: Ray Maualuga – LB, USC
The Chargers haven't had a good inside linebacker since Donnie Edwards.

17. New York Jets
Pick: Josh Freeman – QB, Kansas State
The Jets shock the experts here by not selecting Massachusetts QB Liam Coen, who is, according to Minutemen fans, "wicked sweet."

18. Denver
Pick: Robert Ayers – DE/OLB, Tennessee
With Denver switching to a 3-4, they need a threat to rush the passer, which Ayers gives them.

19. Tampa Bay Buccaneers
Pick: Michael Johnson – DE, Georgia Tech
All signs point to DE here, and not that end/linebacker hybrid crap. The Bucs play a 4-3 cover 2 and want a lineman with some beef. Football? Got some!

20. Detroit Lions
Pick: James Laurinaitis – ILB, Ohio State
The Lions already have their QB, now they grab a talented linebacker to help their awful defense on their equally awful team.

21. Philadelphia Eagles
Pick: Knowshon Moreno – Running back, Georgia
Easy. The Eagles have been saying how they're interested in this kid.

22. Minnesota Vikings
Pick: Percy Harvin – WR, Florida
Harvin's a great talent and is apparently a fan of the game. Maybe they'll line him up behind center instead of Tarvaris Jackson.

23. New England Patriots
Pick: Sean Smith – CB, UMass
Patriots tend not to make sense with their picks. I have no shot of getting this right.

24. Atlanta Falcons
Pick: Evander "Ziggy" Hood – DT, Missouri
With a name like Ziggy, you can't go wrong.

25. Miami Dolphins
Pick: Vontae Davis – CB, Illinois
No one cares about the Dolphins.

26. Baltimore Ravens
Pick: Darrius Heyward-Bay – WR, Maryland
The Ravens have been looking for a good receiver for years. I don't think it's this guy – too many last names.

27. Indianapolis Colts
Pick: Peria Jerry – DT, Ole Miss
Colts get a break by landing Jerry, who will fill a huge hole in the Swiss cheese defense of Indy.

28. Buffalo Bills
Pick: Brandon Pettigrew – Tight End, Okl. State
After picking up Terrell Owens in the offseason, the addition of Pettigrew gives Bills QB Trent Edwards a strong receiving corps with Lee Evans.

29. New York Giants
Pick: Hakeem Nicks – WR North Carolina
The Giants need a big target for Elisha Manning that won't shoot himself in the leg.

30. Tennessee Titans
Pick: Darius Butler – CB, Connecticut
The Titans have needed a wideout for years and simply refuse to draft a good one. They won't start now.

31. Arizona Cardinals
Pick: Beanie Wells – RB, Ohio State
It's Beanie, don't bother calling him Chris. Anyway, since Marcel Shipp apparently isn't good enough for the pros and they cut Steve Baylark, they're going with a back from an FBS program.

32. Pittsburgh Steelers
Pick: Max Unger – C, Oregon
Seriously, look at the name and tell me the Steelers won't pick this guy. He's going to have a 13-year career based on that name alone.

Fresh off 14th Atlantic 10 title, UMass set for MIT

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

After an emotional victory last weekend, the Massachusetts rowing team will travel to Boston this weekend to compete against the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The two teams will begin racing the shores of the Charles River at approximately 9 a.m., on Saturday.

UMass is coming off its most satisfying win of the season, capturing its 13th Atlantic 10 Championship title after a rare one-year hiatus from the championship.

When asked if the atmosphere has been better after the team emerged victorious last weekend, UMass rowing coach Jim Dietz concluded that it has not been too different at all.

"It's been great all year," Dietz said. "The athletes have been much better focused [this season]."

The event this weekend will be the Minutewomen's last chance to prepare for the last approaching Eastern College Athletic Championships, which start on the May 2. In what Dietz expects to be a grueling race, he hopes that UMass' consistency will be on display on Saturday.

"You can't be fast every weekend," Dietz said. "We're definitely looking to peak later in the year, but this weekend we are just looking for some solid rowing."

The Minutewomen were stellar last weekend in the A-10 Championships – finishing in first place in five events and taking second in another four.

The strong performance of UMass' Lightweight 4, has Dietz experimenting this weekend. The Lightweight 4 raced an impressive time of 7:51.9 last weekend, and Dietz will give some of the rowers an opportunity to compete in the Lightweight 8 race this weekend.

Next weekend UMass will compete in the ECAC Championships, which will feature some of the strongest rowing teams from across the East Coast. Among them, will be the Minutewomen's A-10 rival Rhode Island.

Grand exit for Normandin

Down to last strike, junior star lifts UM to thrilling win with grand slam

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Carly Normandin, who leads the Minutewomen in virtually every offensive category, provided the heroics Thursday night with a game-winning grand slam in the ninth to beat UConn.

Carly Normandin leads the Massachusetts softball team in batting average, hits and slugging percentage and on Thursday she led her team to a 6-4 win against Connecticut.

In the seventh inning, Normandin was in the situation that every child dreams of. The Minutewomen were down by one run with the bases loaded and two outs in the final inning. To add to the drama, Normandin even had two strikes on her.

The junior star didn't panic and took the next pitch and deposited it over the left field wall to give pitcher Brandice Balschmiter her 21st win of the season in dramatic fashion.

Balschmiter (21-4) gave up four runs on 11 hits and three walks in her complete game victory, but three of those four runs came in a shaky sixth inning for UMass (28-6), which extended its winning streak to 17 games.

The Huskies (25-17) were scoreless until catcher Erin Burtner hit a two-run home run in the sixth after Balschmiter gave up a leadoff single to Micah Truax.

Truax was a problem for Balschmiter all game long, having already earned two walks and finishing the day going 2-for-2 with two RBI and two runs scored.

Jillian Ortega followed up Truax's homer with a double to right field. Designated hitter Amy Deluca singled between third baseman Whitney Mollica and shortstop Whitney Williams to put two runners on for the Huskies with no outs.

First baseman Justyne Roy singled up the middle to score Ortega and give the Huskies a 3-2 lead. Balschmiter retired the next three batters but the damage was already done.

Down to its final at-bat and trailing, 3-2, UMass started a rally against reliever Jessie Satavola, who came in earlier in the game for starter Rachael Crossin.

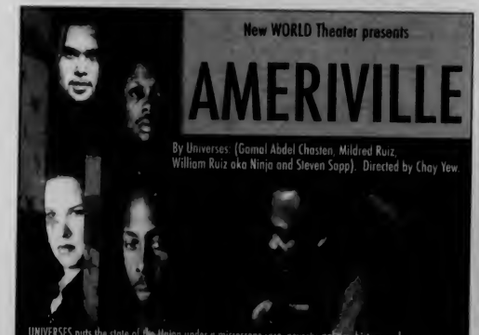
Playing in her 200th career game as a Minutewoman, Mollica led off the inning with a single to center field – her 200th career hit. After stealing second base, Mollica moved over to third after designated hitter Michelle Libby sacrificed bunted. Williams followed with a walk – prompting UConn to insert Crossin back into the game.

The move didn't work out for the Huskies.

Williams immediately stole second base and Seno walked to lead the bases with one out. Davina Hernandez struck out swinging on a 3-2 pitch to set up Normandin in the high-pressure situation.

After taking the 1-2 pitch for a ball Normandin delivered.

Crossin's next pitch went over her head as quickly as it left her hand for Normandin's sixth home run of the season and a 6-3 UMass lead.



All the Minutewomen had to do was hold off the Huskies in the bottom of the seventh inning.

With another UMass scare in the bottom of the inning, it didn't look like UMass would.

Balschmiter surrendered a leadoff walk to second baseman Julianne Towers before Truax struck again with a single to right field. Balschmiter allowed the next three batters to reach – including an RBI single to Jillian Ortega – but she was able to get out of the jam by inducing a game-ending double-play on a ground ball by Roy.

UMass will continue play next in a conference battle at Charlotte on Sunday.

A–10 win streak on line vs. La Salle

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Before last weekend's sweep of Saint Joseph's, the last time the Massachusetts baseball team took three games from an Atlantic 10 opponent was almost a year ago.

Riding a four-game winning streak, the Minutemen hope to get their second-straight series victory of the season when they travel to Philadelphia to face La Salle in a three-game series slated to begin Friday afternoon at 3:30 p.m.

UMass (14-19, 7-8 A-10) has won eight of its past 11 games, and looks to get back to .500 in A-10 play against the struggling Explorers (15-20, 4-10 A-10).

"When people pitch well, they set the tone, and when they hit and field well, it's contagious," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "So we just want to continue to play well and make sure that we are mentally prepared going into each game were we aren't overly confident."

The Explorers are tied for last place in the A-10 with Duquesne, despite having the fifth-best batting average in the conference at .301.

Before their mid-week contest against Central Connecticut State was postponed due to rain Tuesday, the Minutemen recorded their first series sweep of the season, defeating the Hawks in a three-game home stand last weekend.

In the bottom of the 10th inning of Sunday's contest, junior outfielder Mike Donato capped a triumphant comeback for UMass, hitting a walk-off two-run homer to lead the Minutemen over the Hawks, 11-9.

"It was nice to have, [since] we've been on the other end of that quite a few times this season," Stone said, referring to all the late and heartbreaking losses his team has had in 2009.

Back-to-back complete game pitching performances by southpaws Mitchell Clegg and Nick Serino, clutch hitting, along with Stone's 600th career victory highlighted what is perhaps the team's best three-game stint of the 2009 campaign.

The pair has combined to strikeout 56 batters in conference games, more than half the team's total and has a combined 4-2 A-10 record.

After the ramout, Stone will most likely look to senior Mike DiCato to start against the Explorers.

The right-hander is 3-2 on the year, with his best outing coming on March 28 against Fordham. He pitched 7-1/3 innings in that game, surrendering just one earned run to go along with two strikeouts.

UMass hit .326 as a team last week, with all nine Minuteman starters contributing at least one hit apiece in the final two games of the SJU series.

"It's always positive when you're feeling good about what you are doing on the field and you're seeing positive results and it definitely makes a difference offensively going into the next game," Stone said.

The Minutemen have also found the long ball as of late, with eight different players hitting 13 home runs in the past four games.

After two wins against A-10 foe George Washington, the Explorers fell to Maryland in a non-conference game Tuesday and were rained out Wednesday against Coppin State.

Outfielder Tony Negrin had a season-high four hits and scored twice against the Terrapins, but the Explorers were in a hole early when UMD posted five runs in the second inning on four hits.

The Explorers rallied and tied the game at five with three runs in the fifth and a two-run seventh inning, along with four scoreless innings pitched by reliever Christian Schulz.

But a solo home run by the Terps gave them the one-run lead, which they would eventually hold onto for the victory.

The last time the Minutemen faced the Explorers was in 2007, with UMass winning the first two games of the series before falling to the Explorers in the finale.

Junior outfielder Garrett Glashoff and the Minutemen swept last weekend's series against Saint Joseph's. UMass looks to extend its four-game winning streak against La Salle.

Track teams back home

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams will host the Pre-Conference Meet at the UMass Track & Field Complex on Saturday as each team looks to gain momentum in the final meet before the championship season.

The Minutemen are coming off a solid performance at last week's Larry Ellis Invitational in Princeton and look to duplicate the strong effort they had at last year's Pre-Conference Meet.

Juniors Sean Duncan and Jonathan Pierce are coming off strong performances in Princeton. Both delivered Top-10 performances in distance events as they qualified for the IC4A Championships, which take place in May.

Duncan finished sixth in the 3000 meter steeple chase with a time of 9 minutes, 8.13 seconds. Pierce took ninth on the 5000 meter with a time of 14:20.24.

UMass expects another strong effort from the distance runners, who dominated in the team's last home meet on April 11. The Minutemen were strong in the 10,000 meter – taking the Top 4 positions in the race. Junior Andrew Mulvaney won the event with a time of 30:39.12. Duncan and Pierce each finished in the Top 2 in their respective events in the Minutemen's first home meet this season. Duncan won the 3000 meter steeple chase (9:16.08), while Pierce took second in the 5000 meter (14:43.18).

At last year's meet juniors Tyler Cotto and Chris Vercollone both delivered first-place finishes for UMass. In the track events, Cotto finished the 110 meter hurdles in 15.82 seconds while Vercollone won the only gold for the Minutemen in the field events with a javelin toss of 175 feet.

On the women's side, this week's top story is the recent dominance of junior Lisa Wilson. Wilson earned Atlantic 10 Co-Performer of the Week honors after finishing first in the discus, third in the hammer and fourth in the shot put at last weekend's Larry Ellis Invitational.

With a throw of 156-02 in the discus, she qualified for the NCAA Regionals and broke her own school record, which she originally set last year. She has qualified for the ECACs in all three events.

The UMass distance runners also delivered an outstanding effort last week and should be feeling confident heading into Saturday's meet. The Minutewomen placed six runners in the Top 10 of the 1500 meters.

The Minutewomen also grabbed four first-place finishes at last year's meet. Junior Holly Hemricher won the 200 meter dash with a time of 26.12, and teamed with Brittany Bakanowski, Ros Murphy and Alisha Tatham to take the 4x100 relay (45.53). Wilson took home both wins in the field events, with throws of 40-10.5 in the shot put and 161-7 in the hammer.

The other teams that will compete are Central Connecticut State, Dartmouth, Hartford, Harvard, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and the Connecticut men.

The meet will begin at 11:30 a.m., with the field events. The first half hour will feature both the men and women competing in the shot put, javelin, long jump and pole vault. The track events will begin at noon with the men's 4x100m relay, with the final events of the day being the men's and women's 4x400m relays.

Globe reacts as deadline approaches

Staff reacts to possibility of a shuttered Boston institution

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

(Editor's Note: This is part one of a three-part series. Readers can view all three today on www.dailycollegian.com)

Just before his week ended, Boston Globe political reporter Brian C. Mooney overheard conversations which would spread through the newsroom at 135 Morrissey Boulevard in Dorchester, Mass., like wildfire. Fifteen feet away from his desk, a reporter from the business section and the business editor discussed an article nearing its deadline for the next morning's paper. Despite word leaking out fewer than 48 hours after April Fool's Day, the story was no joke and prompted anything but laughter from Mooney and his co-workers.

"It was shock; it was worry; it was anger," he recalled.

After 137 years, New England's largest newspaper, its 184 million weekly print readers, four million unique online monthly visitors and its 2,200 full-time and 550 part-time employees learned The Boston Globe had a 30-day, May 1st deadline from The New York Times Company to cut $20 million, or else the publication's presses will stop and its doors will shut – for good.

THE LUCKY ONE

As a Boston College undergraduate, George Rizer joined The Globe for a photography internship in 1970. When the 23-year-old, Bridgewater, Mass., landed his first "real job" with the newspaper, he ended his studies several courses shy of earning a bachelor's from B.C. Thirty-nine years later he is poised to leave his beloved career the same way he left college – slightly sooner than planned.

In March, Rizer accepted a buyout package with 23 other newsroom staff members including fellow photographers Mark Wilson and Steve Haines. Rizer's last day will be June 26, assuming the newspaper survives that long.

Seated at a large, vacant desk in a dimly-lit room just after 6 a.m., the 62-year-old photojournalist looked over his assignments for the day from his Macintosh notebook. On either side him were two police scanners set at different frequencies. Rizer has three more scanners in his tan-colored Buick, and what he refers to as his "background music" is almost always kept on and at an audible level, whether at home or work.

But, as helpful as the scanners have been over the years in helping Rizer develop a niche for spot news, but even they were able to tip him off to The Times Co.'s threat to shutter the paper.

"It hit like a ton of bricks," he remembers.

When he had volunteered for the buyout just weeks before the threat came down, he knew The Globe was struggling financially, but so was the rest of the media industry. The economy was in similar shape. Nearing retirement age, Rizer felt the incentive package, which included a good chunk of money and medical coverage for a year, was too appealing to pass up. He knew he would miss The Globe, his work and colleagues, but the buyout would enable him to be reasonably comfortable while he looks for another job, possibly teaching and doing freelance photography on the side. However, Rizer's departure does not mean his wallet is immune from feeling the company's next cuts as retirement benefits are rumored to be on the chopping block.

Yet, looking back on the decision to leave the job he loves, Rizer now considers himself lucky when he thinks of what may be in store for many of his co-workers.

"I feel guilty because I'm the one getting out just in the nick of time," he said. "There are certainly a lot of people who are worried about the future of the place."

"We're not running on skeleton staff right now," he continued. "But we're certainly considerably reduced. And maybe we could take a small hit in the near future, but then, how much more are you going to reduce?"

WORRIED BUT OPTIMISTIC

Writer's note: For this story, about 200 of The Globe's 300-person editorial staff were e-mailed in mid-April requesting their thoughts on the paper's current circumstances and its uncertain future. Twenty-five of them responded, 18 of these declined to comment, commonly citing such reasons as being too busy or being uncomfortable to speak on the topic.

But, of the seven Globe newsroom staff members interviewed – Rizer, Mooney, sports columnist Dan Shaughnessy, chief imaging technician John Tovey, an editor who requested anonymity, deputy bureau chief Joseph Williams and foreign policy reporter Farah Stockman, both from the Washington D.C. bureau – each expressed concern for their company's future.

The editor who asked to remain anonymous was in the process of leaving The Globe for another career entirely when they were interviewed.

"I left The Globe because I was concerned about its future," said the editor, who has since left the paper.

The 42-year-old has two children in grade school to support and was "worried that there would not be an outlet for the [kind of stories I write] in the new, trimmer Globe."

"I tried for a long time to find another job that would allow me to still consider myself a 'journalist,' but the industry as a whole is in such terrible shape right now," the editor said after spending two decades in journalism.

When the editor joined The Globe over eight years ago, the editorial staff was over 500. Since then, 200 have been cut and the editor expects the newsroom staff to dip below 100 over the next couple of years before eventually settling near 50.

"It's a very scary time, and there's been a lot of uncertainty in the industry," said Shaughnessy. "This certainly is kind of a shocking thing to deal with. We're putting out a good paper and just hoping for the best. That's about all you can do at this point. It's not a good time."

After a 32-year career in journalism with other gigs in sports media, including 11 books, television appearances on NESN and contributions to ESPN Magazine, Shaughnessy is less worried about his own situation and is instead concerned about his colleagues'.

"I'm more worried about people with young children, and this is their only means of their livelihood," he said.

Shaughnessy, who grew up in Groton, Mass., reading The Globe, said if the paper closed he would just hope the phone rang.

Globe employees woke up to this headline on April 4, which left many wondering how long their jobs would be available and what the future holds. Political reporter Brian Mooney heard the story's whispers and said the news hit "like a ton of bricks."

UM Republican Club elects Khanna as new president

By Hannah McGoldrick
Collegian Staff

Last week the UMass Republican Club voted to elect SGA commuter senator Derek Khanna to the club's presidency for the 2009-2010 academic year.

The election was pivotal, especially in the wake of former-President Brad DeFlumeri's impeachment-turned resignation, earlier this month. Khanna faced a similar experience last year when he himself faced impeachment under Article VIII Section 1 of the UMRC Constitution. The motion of impeachment was tied with a 7-7 vote, not enough to impeach then-Vice President Khanna.

When asked about the impeachment, after some silence, he said, "Personal issues in the club in the past have caused tension. We hope to move past those issues and involve Brad and his future endeavors."

Despite these events, Khanna hopes to "keep them in the past." The new president's mission for next year is to change the self-described negative perception of the Republican Club on campus.

"I hope to increase cooperation with other RSOs on campus such as the Student Alliance for Israel (SAFI) and the UMass Democrats ...for various reasons those relationships have been strained [in the past]," he said, although he did not elaborate on the reasons.

Khanna and newly elected vice president, Justin Thompson, share the vision of creating a more welcoming club.

As the new UMass Republican Club president, Khanna said he hopes to improve the club's image.

"We want to reach out to the community but stick to our Republican values," Thompson said.

In terms of collaborating with other RSOs Thompson said, "Despite philosophical differences, there is no need for us to be at odds . . .we want people to understand that we are not promoting hate speech; we are opening up a forum for discussion."

Derek Khanna at a Republican Club meeting last year, his election is considered a controversial topic, but some members are optimistic.

Khanna tapped to lead UMRC, voices mixed on decision

Not all campus community members are pleased with the election results. DeFlumeri commented by saying, "Under my leadership of the club, he was an incompetent, selfish and careless vice president." When asked about his thoughts on Khanna's mission he said, "I understand that his platform for the presidency last week was full of lies and distortions. I have no doubt that the Republican Club will suffer, if not dissolve, under his 'leadership.'"

Other members of the campus community such as International Socialist Organization member, Charles Peterson said that he thinks, "The Republican club is taking off their clan robes and putting on better garments."

DeFlumeri further commented that the UMRC's "more committed members, who have the utter misfortune of having to work with him, have my most sincere sympathies. Worst of all, Derek Khanna is a liberal and afraid to push a conservative agenda."

Despite extreme opposition, Khanna concluded by stating his motto, "The ship should never go down without its captain, and if I ever become a liability to the club, I would be the first to resign."

Globe's staff unsure where it, paper goes

but the prospect of landing a job with a newspaper – especially with his 300 co-workers also seeking employment – would be grim in an already "shrinking landscape."

The paper's threatened future has spurred a steady buzz of rumors among the staff about what has been happening during the non-public negotiations between union officials, management and ownership, and all that talk has hurt employee morale around company headquarters, Shaughnessy said.

Daniel Totten, president of the Boston Newspaper Guild (BNG) which represents over 700 Globe employees, also said the rumors regarding The Globe's fate are prevalent in the newsroom.

"They do nothing to help an already-stressful situation. They only fuel the fire as speculation, innuendo and the like have no value to our members' futures," said Totten, who has worked at The Globe's advertising sales department since 1980.

In Washington D.C., speculation and uncertainty exist as well. The bureau includes nine, soon-to-be eight, staff members.

Williams, bureau chief Peter Canellos, an office manager and six reporters. Reporter Sasha Issenberg is expected to leave the bureau in coming months, having just accepted a buyout.

Stockman, 34, who started with The Globe in 2000, remembered how she and fellow D.C. staff first heard of The Times Co.'s recent threat in an article posted on the Romenesko blog, which initially caused confusion for Stockman and crew since they had not yet been contacted by management or union representatives.

One of the largest D.C. bureaus of any regional newspaper, closing the location could be a quick cost-cutting method. Politico.com reporter Michael Calderone noted in an article published April 9 titled, "Will Globe close shop in D.C.?" that closing bureaus in the nation's capital has been a common money-saving approach other newspapers have taken.

Stockman, a B.C. grad, said Calderone's article has been well-read by the bureau's personnel.

"I think everybody in the industry right now has to look at what their options are and whether it's realistic to think you'll be a newspaper reporter for the rest of your life or whether there are other things that should be considered," she said.

Totten started with The Globe when he was 19 and stuck with his hometown paper for 32 years as plans to be a police officer fell through, despite scoring a 96 on his application exam. Now 51, married with two kids, he said despite most employees having their own sources from management to find out what's going on with negotiations, "a lot of people look like they're running scared."

"They're making poor decisions," he continued. "I have no control over that. It shit hits the fan I want to know that I did my best. But, I'm scared, too."

Williams, Stockman's co-worker who has spent 25 of his 47 years in journalism, said he's reminded daily of the frustration sweeping the newspaper industry. He rides a bus, then the Metro, to get to his office in the nation's capital, and on his way to work, he sees people of all ages reading various print publications. Every morning, like clockwork, an older man drives up to Williams' bus stop in a Lexus SUV, pulls over, parks, gets out of his car, walks past the coin box for The Washington Post and past the coin box for The New York Times to grab a free copy of The Washington Metro. It's frustrating because people want to read, said Williams, but print newspapers are missing something that many readers are looking for, and the Internet has yet to provide a cost-effective business model.

As Rizer put it, "it's an ugly scene across the country."

GOP ready for revamp

Paul Payer

It can be said, with a fair amount of certainty, that the approach employed by Republicans in generating support for their cause has diminished significantly in recent years. The party fooled itself into thinking that America was a center-right nation which longed for a far-right form of governance. Their folly has resulted in consecutive electoral defeats at the state and federal level, resulting in strong Democratic majorities in the House of Representatives, Senate and White House as well as across the nation's state legislatures and Governor's mansions.

The Republican brand is damaged and unpopular with the American public. Once the party of the "big tent," it is now perceived as an isolated, out-of-touch group granting power to small factions to dominate party messages and actions.

Suggesting a national strategy to regain the relevance of the Republican Party across this nation would require a bit more space than the 850 words afforded by this column and possibly someone of more expertise with the dynamics of U.S. party politics than an undergraduate political science major. That said, the struggles, challenges and hopes for revitalization faced by the Republican Party closely mirror those of our own beloved Republican Club on campus.

For the past three years, the Republican Club has aimed solely to provoke UMass students, not into constructive political dialogue but into a fervent partisan rancor over the organization's on-campus activity.

For the majority of students at the University of Massachusetts, mention of the Republican Club invokes thoughts of provocative speakers, provocative posters and provocative rallies.

Get the point? For the past three years, the Republican Club has aimed solely to provoke UMass students, not into constructive political dialogue but into a fervent partisan rancor over the organization's on-campus activity.

With the impeachment of the club's iconic leader and former President on the grounds of less than admirable accusations, the club has found itself at a crossroads. Do they continue the practices which have become entrenched in Republican Club activity or do they embrace a new philosophy of respectful political discourse and intellectualism?

Should the purpose of the Republican Club be to generate headlines and campus gossip or to represent conservative minds on campus and foster meaningful debate over relevant political matters?

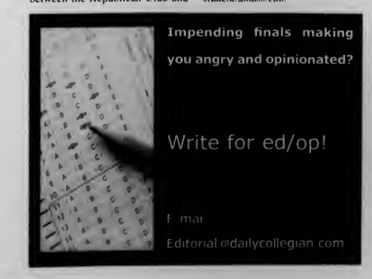
There is evidence to suggest that the organization has dedicated itself to following the latter course of action and revitalize its image and purpose on campus. The club's incoming President, Derek Khanna, envisions a reorganization of the club to establish itself as a respected conduit for political discourse – rather than a source of gossip, controversy and humor for the general campus community.

Khanna views these efforts as twofold: improving dialogue between the Republican Club and campus organizations and rethinking how the organization seeks to project its image on campus.

Immediately following the impeachment of then-vice president Brad DeFlumeri and subsequent shakeup at the Republican Club's office, the club has engaged in a concerted effort to reopen damaged lines of dialogue and develop new ones.

According to Khanna, the club has contacted professors in the political science department and sent numerous letters to liberal organizations on campus inviting them to attend Republican Club-sponsored events with the intention of engaging in respectful but challenging political discussion. Khanna also hopes to develop a strong relationship with the UMass Democrats through joint-executive board aimed at improving dialogue and debate on campus.

The club must also recognize that past efforts to promote events through extreme language and explosive imagery has served only to heighten partisan sensibilities and encourage outcomes similar to Don Feder's appearance last month. Advertisements intended to promote Republican Club events, via Facebook groups, flyers and so forth, in the past were aimed to incite as much anger and disgust among the student body with the sole intention of creating disruption and controversy rather than attract the genuine interest of conservatives or constructive opposition from the left.



The club has stated a desire to make progress on this effort and seems to be holding true to their word given the approach pursed in promoting a Dr. Mike Adams lecture on April 30. Adams spoke several years ago at UMass following several weeks of promotion featuring offensive posters enticing a vocal protest of his speech by pro-choice and liberal organizations on campus.

This time around, though, the Republican Club has billed the event as "an opportunity to engage in dialogue over Roe V. Wade and abortion in the United States". The event may still attract protestors as one's image and reputation cannot be changed overnight. But at least the Republican Club will have demonstrated an attempt at dialogue.

The Republican Club will, for lack of a better description, always be a club for Republicans on campus. And for that very fact, segments of the UMass population will persist in despising any effort associated with the club. Winning over majority support on campus would be practically impossible. They are situated on a left-leaning state university campus in the bluest of blue states.

What the club can do is respond to the evolving political landscape in this country and on the campus and develop a new brand of Republicanism which places a premium on engaging in dialogue and respectful discourse. This will open up the club to the broader conservative and moderate population at UMass and invite intellectual speakers to improve the academic experience for students at the school.

Free speech, to a point

Ben Thompson

There are people on this campus who are stuck in the past. They have become so entrenched in the 80s and 90s that they refuse to acknowledge any piece of history thereafter.

I am not alluding to the 1980s and 1990s. Rather the 1780's and 1790's.

Written in 1791, the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States declared that, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

If this were the only document pertaining to our rights of free speech, my editorial opinion would end here – obviously, that is not the case.

In the Supreme Court decision, Schenck vs. the United States, in 1919, Justice Oliver Wendell Homes Jr. wrote, "Words which, ordinarily and in many places, would be within the freedom of speech protected by the First Amendment may become subject to prohibition when of such a nature and used in such circumstances as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils which Congress has a right to prevent."

The Supreme Court's unanimous ruling in this case sets the precedent that it is illegal to use your right to free speech to bring about a clear and present danger. Holmes continued with this example:

"The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theater, and causing a panic."

It is ironic that when there is a supposed violation of free speech, the first organization to be called is Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (F.I.R.E.).

You can believe that you have the absolute right to free speech and free press. But you will have to concede that the Supreme Court and Massachusetts General Laws disagree with you.

Schenck vs. the United States, however, is not the only precedent limiting free speech. There are also cases of slander and libel. A libelous statement, according to the Massachusetts Bar Association, is a statement that is: "false; defamatory (i.e., discredits its subject); published with some degree of fault (negligently in the case of a private figure plaintiff and with actual malice in the case of a public official or figure); and damaging to its subject."

Some cases of libel in Massachusetts have yielded multi-million dollar lawsuits. In the case of Murphy vs. Boston Herald, Inc. in 2007, the court decided that, "The press, however, is not free to publish false information about anyone (even a judge whose sentencing decisions have incurred the wrath of the local district attorney), intending that it will cause a public furor, while knowing, or in reckless disregard of, its falsity." Judge Ernest B. Murphy, the plaintiff, was awarded $2.1 million in damages as a result of the defamation of his character.

The simple truth is that our free speech is conditional.

You can believe that you have the absolute right to free speech and free press. But you will have to concede that the Supreme Court and Massachusetts General Laws disagree with you. Anything that you say or write in a public sphere can be grounds for slander, libel or construed as a cause of clear and present danger.

In the spirit of Voltaire, I will defend your right to disagree with me – even to the death – but I will not tolerate – even for a fleeting moment – your slanderous remarks.

So, the next time that you want to yell, "I have the right to free speech," try to be a little more historically accurate. Try yelling something like, "I have the right to free speech, except in the cases of slander, libel, or instances in which I may bring about a clear and present danger."

Ben Thompson is a UMass student

Redemption key to ending corruption

Eric Magazu

Recent events surrounding leaders in the University of Massachusetts Republican Club indicates a pervasive problem in government. The issue underlying this problem is that there is no common moral code affirmed throughout our nation. The leaders we elect therefore naturally reflect our own rotted nature, as we are lacking the power of one who can rescue us from ourselves.

The important judgment to be made is of the status of political leaders that become involved with the appearance of sexual impropriety. Their ability to make decisions with proper judgment is called into question.

The Republican Party has long attempted to build its reputation as being the defender of tradition, morality and culture, exactly what it seems we need in our communities today. It appears perplexing then, that students aligned with center-right politics allow themselves to openly engage in these forms of wrongdoing.

Many will object to this on the basis that personal morality does not have an effect on political leadership. This argument, however, was frequently made a decade ago when former President Bill Clinton became involved with a White House intern.

Instead, the argument has to do with the compromised nature of politicians who engage in personal misconduct. Their very judgment is easily compromised and they can become targets of blackmail.

The fact that our animalistic desires are satisfied by engaging in certain behaviors means that we will seek to continue in these behaviors. Human beings have enough trouble executing justice properly in a normal condition. The results, then, are disastrous when combined with an improper external influence.

It would be wrong to make the case that the problem of corruption is unique to government leaders. The truth is that corruption is part of being human.

Domestic lobbyists and the agents of foreign nations can make better use of politicians when they are in compromised states. They can threaten the withdrawal of the mechanism for satisfying the desire or public exposure in order to attain compliance with their aims and get political leaders to act in ways contrary to the interests of their country, conscience and constituents.

To protect us from this prospect, Article XVIII of the Declaration of Rights of the Massachusetts Constitution teaches us that, "A constant adherence to those of piety, justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality, are absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty, and to maintain a free government. The people ought, consequently, to have a particular attention to all those principles, in the choice of their officers and representatives: and they have a right to require of their lawgivers and magistrates, an exact and constant observance of them."

It would be wrong to make the case that the problem of corruption is unique to government leaders. The truth is that corruption is part of being human.

Every one of us is motivated by impure desires that pull us away from the ideals of justice and mercy, the ideals by which the entire world would be governed if it was in its ideal state.

There exists only one natural desire by which we can find our salvation. Think back to your favorite books and movies and reflect upon what made you keep going back to them. It is tempting to say that it is man's capacity to love that can save us. But love is often the progenitor of most of our misplaced desires.

The only desire that can correct all of the other false motivators is our desire to be redeemed. This is the desire that someone will come to our rescue in a time of trial, ready to buy us back and make us worthwhile once again. This redemptive power must be made manifest throughout all institutions and social classes.

The only trouble is that by definition it is impossible to be redeemed by our own efforts. If a man can rescue himself, then he is not in need of a redeemer. If we are really self-sufficient in this way, then how is it that we find hope that there is someone out there that will answer us on the day we call?

This can be particularly disheartening to religious and philosophical people, because we believe that our rituals or our reason has made us 'good.' Our works are in vain, as it is taught in the Psalm 127, "If the Lord does not build a house, then its builders labor upon it in vain."

Redemption only brings hope to the simple and the outcast, because it is their assurance that, despite having been dragged through the grime of life, in the end they will come up clean. The Lord does not show favoritism. We know that all men stand equal under Him, as it is taught in the Psalm130, "If You were to preserve iniquities, my Lord, who could survive? But forgiveness is with You, that You may be held in awe."

True redemption can only come from above. Heaven alone is our only sure reliance, and in the Lord alone can we safely place our trust, as it is taught in Psalm 51, "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; O God, You will not despise a broken and crushed heart."

The Lord is our Rock and our Redeemer.

Gunn speaks on 'Runway' season loaded with drama

By Madeleine Marr
McClatchy Newspapers

MIAMI — "Project Runway" fans have been on quite a ride lately.

Bravo's mega-popular fashion competition had been in lawsuit limbo until earlier this month, when a settlement was reached: Producer Harvey Weinstein consented to sell "PR" to Lifetime, on which Season 6 is set to air Aug. 20. This time around, the designers set up camp in Los Angeles instead of New York.

Series mentor Tim Gunn is pretty pleased.

"Thank God we're out of the courts," said Gunn. "We got the word on April 1 that it was a go — I thought it was an April Fool's joke."

Though the show isn't the be-all, end-all for Gunn, who taught at Parsons for more than 20 years and is traveling with DKNY Jeans to help women improve their look. He's also the author of "A Guide to Quality, Taste and Style" and host of Bravo's "Tim Gunn's Guide to Style." Phew.

The 55-year-old Washington, D.C., native took a few moments' time-out for a quick chat.

Q: What fashion advice do you give most often?

A: "I always say there are three key aspects to being fashionable: silhouette, proportion and fit. I think people make the biggest mistake with the latter. They wear items that are too big or too small. Once you find something that fits you perfectly, buy more than one of that item."

Film star Foxx goes for the gold every time

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

Is there a figure in show business today with more breathtaking ambition than Jamie Foxx?

A chart-topping pop star at 41, a "brand name" comedy talent with his own Sirius Satellite Radio channel, and an Academy Award winning actor who has parlayed his film stardom into an array of attention-grabbing "for your consideration" performances, Foxx has made more of his Oscar win (for "Ray") than most any actor you can name.

"The tag line of 'The Soloist' really works for Jamie Foxx," says Joe Wright, who directed Foxx in the drama about a newspaper reporter and a mentally disturbed musician that opens Friday. 'You don't get anywhere without taking some risks.' Jamie challenges himself, film after film. Not being afraid of failure makes a different sort of actor. Being brave enough to fail is how you get great performances."

Foxx made the leap, as actor and movie star, with 2004's "Collateral." After that, Entertainment Weekly and others could pronounce, "Jamie Foxx has arrived as a movie star." But fans might have picked up the ambition, the attention to craft, as far back as his deep character turn as trainer and friend to Will Smith's Muhammad Ali in 2001's "Ali."

"I look at Will Smith and think, 'Wow, he's got a niche,'" Foxx says. "Look at Chris Rock. He's got a niche. What's my niche? So I see movies like this as a chance to find my niche, character roles. To take somebody on and just dive into the role, disappear if I can."

For "The Soloist," Foxx disappears into the chattering, fragile and schizophrenic Nathaniel Ayers, a once-promising musician who went to Juilliard, but whom Los Angeles Times columnist Steve Lopez discovered homeless, living and playing a battered violin on the streets of Los Angeles.

"We have even more in common than you might think," Foxx says of Ayers, whom he observed and secretly camera-phone recorded to get "the syncopation, the rhythm" of his patter, his no-eye-contact mannerisms.

Foxx says that he, like Ayers, "sees music, visualizes it. He is possessed by it and I am, too. I hear music and I see a movie in my head. Nathaniel, I think, experiences it in a similar way."

Like Ayers, Foxx was once a promising classical musician who went to college to study music composition. "When I was 18 years old in college somebody slipped me something into my drink. I lost it for like 11 months. Paranoid, man, all my childhood fears came back. That's always been my fear, losing my mind. I played piano to keep myself grounded. A doctor I saw at the time said, 'Some people get that done to them and never come back.' But music and friends really helped me through it."

Jamie Foxx has made a name for himself in both film and pop music. The entertainer's latest film, "The Soloist," finds him playing a mentally disturbed musician.

He confesses that his fears of mental illness lingered through the filming of "The Soloist." If you get too deep into character, he wondered, "Can you catch schizophrenia?" Of course not, "but still, I had to let my mind go to get to that place where he is. I relied a lot on Joe Wright and Robert Downey Jr. at the end of the day to pull me back."

The movie pairs Foxx with one of the few actors who can match him in playing fast patter. Downey and Foxx turned their conversations into improvised duologues - both characters talking at once, neither really listening to the other. "Joe told us 'I want this to be like music, both guys talking at once — solos, duets, competing melodies, complementing one another.' "

"The Soloist" was originally slated for release during last Oscar season, so a late April arrival can't help but disappoint cast and crew (although the Oscar-nominated "The Visitor" arrived at roughly the same time last year). In any event, Foxx has worn, as he likes to put it, "another coat, another character" for his filmography.

"I did this (tribute) for Al Pacino a while back, and we're looking at clips of his movies, all across his career, the people he played, and you see this variety, all these different people he became," Foxx marvels. "That's what you do it for. You don't do it for the success, the cash, whatever. You do it so that you can look back and see, years on, the great characters you've brought to life. It's about who you become and reminiscing over those great parts you got to play when you're older. That's my ambition."

Slow and easy with indie rock hero M. Ward

Mellow songwriter leaves his mark on Austin's SXSW

By Chris Riemenschneider
Star Tribune (Minneapolis)

AUSTIN, TEXAS — No wonder M. Ward keeps coming back and making the most of the South by Southwest Music Conference. The Portland, Ore.-based indie-rock star has found the perfect place to decompress from the festival's wild whir, which was especially wild for him this year.

"I got a pretty good thing," Ward coolly surmised one morning last month, looking the picture of casual as he sipped coffee barefoot on the porch of a cozy little house that belongs to a friend of his manager, tucked away in the quiet, tangled, hilly streets of Austin's Travis Heights neighborhood.

Talking over bellowing grackles and soaking up the merciful March sun, he said, "Portland is very gray and damp this time of the year. Austin's the place I'd rather be right now."

Ward should have looked more exhausted and far less content. The 35-year-old singer, songwriter, producer and guitar-wiz (first name: Matt) had played two gigs the day before and was set to play three more before the fest's end, including Entertainment Weekly's private bash and a public outdoor show that would draw around 5,000 people.

His sweet accommodations weren't the only reason for his remarkably even keel, it became apparent during the interview. He has a naturally mellow way of talking — stewing over words before letting them out — and he had contemplative things to say about his career's purposefully gradual rise.

"I didn't tour for a long time, and I'm sort of coming back to it with a new love for it," he explained.

Ward took much of last year off, and when he did work it was mostly with actress Zooey Deschanel, with whom he made a well-received album under the cutesy moniker She & Him.

"I loved the perspective of allowing Zooey to do the lead vocals, and I just had to handle the arrangements and guitaring," he said. "It was a great perspective. I brought some of that experience to this record."

Ward's fifth album, "Hold Time" — issued in February on marquee indie label Merge Records (Arcade Fire, Spoon) — follows in a steady stream of records that sound coolly classic/timeless and offers a patchwork quilt of musical styles. In this case, the songs range from the glam-rocky "Never Had Nobody Like You" and the Phil Spector-like, doo-woppy "To Save Me" to a mournful country cover with Lucinda Williams ("Oh Lonesome Me") and a slow, sly remake of Buddy Holly's "Rave On."

As with all of his recordings, though — including collaborations with friends such as Conor Oberst (Bright Eyes), Norah Jones and Jenny Lewis — his raspy but rich voice and playful, rollicking guitar-playing keep the music distinctive. There's no mistaking Ward for anyone else, which can't be said of many other talents in modern rock.

On his albums' grab-bag sonic approach: "I think it comes from listening to 'The White Album' growing up, which is sort of the ideal record to stretch all the boundaries. I listen to a lot of different styles of music now, and I think what you consume always comes out in some shape or form. But I also don't want to make a record where you can predict what's going to happen next. A record should be like a good book, where you don't know what's coming around the bend."

On who inspired his distinctive guitar sound: "It started out with George Harrison — and John Lennon, too. Then I started to learn their influences, too, like Chuck Berry and the Everly Brothers. I was first inspired by rhythm guitarists, and it took me a while to really discover guitarists playing as the lead instrument, like Elizabeth Cotton, John Lahey, Mance Lipscomb, on acoustic. Electric guitar was Chet Atkins and Thurston Moore and 'Ed from Ohio' (Ed Crawford) in FIREHOSE. The foundation was the Beatles; that laid the groundwork for me to listen to all types of guitarists."

On the semireligious theme of "Hold Time": "There's definitely a relationship between music and spirituality for me. Music has a way of touching these big questions in a way that's easier than casual conversation or interviews. So I use music to... go

Social networking and food?

By Matt McKinney
Star Tribune (Minneapolis)

MINNEAPOLIS — It's not just a dream. Your supermarket really is talking to you. And its says it's time for vitamins.

"Rough night last night? Hangover remedies abound at the co-op! Kombucha, B vitamins and some soup from the deli and you'll be fine," goes the latest Twitter update from the Mississippi Market in St. Paul, Minn., where managers Darci Gauthier and Liz McMann keep their fingers at the ready to broadcast via the Internet anything and everything they think their customers might want to know.

Their newfound love of Twitter, a networking service that's part blog and part community message board, comes amid a wave of new experiments in online advertising among food companies.

In how-to videos and video contests, social networking, blogs and tweets, everyone from General Mills to the corner store has ventured deep into new territory in recent months. Target, which sells groceries at its SuperTarget stores, now has 195,000 fans on its Facebook page. The lunch specials at several local co-ops are updated daily on Twitter. And Betty Crocker will show you how to make a space shuttle birthday cake via short videos at bettycrocker.com.

Some of the experiments have been awkward, but taken together the new ventures are something of an explosion of social media, a term loosely defined as using cheap online tools like Twitter and Facebook to share words, pictures and video.

"We're seeing more and more companies embrace it," said Jason Rysavy of Catalyst Studios, an interactive agency based in Minneapolis. "You can't just ignore it."

It's the medium that's new, not necessarily the message. The video lessons at bettycrocker.com would have made good episodes of the "Betty Crocker Cooking School of the Air," the radio show begun in the 1920s that ran for nearly 30 years.

"The point of these was to create solutions for moms wanting to look for things like princess birthday cakes and pirate cakes," said Jenny Max, who helped create the videos for General Mills. "After watching a two- to three-minute video, it's not as hard as you think."

A handful of other videos show would-be cooks how to make soups, chocolate-dipped strawberries and something called "mini meatloaf."

It's not as though the Internet is short on how-to cooking videos. Sites like instructables.com, metacafe.com and sammerkitchen.tv show how to channel your inner celebrity chef, but General Mills kept getting questions on its website asking how to make cakes, said Pam Becker, a General Mills spokesperson.

The way the company used the Internet to answer those questions is what social media are all about, said Doug Pollei, a social media expert in the Twin Cities.

"Customer service is the new marketing," said Pollei, one of the local organizers of the Social Media Club of Minnesota, a group that meets regularly to talk about the Internet. "It's easier for companies to listen to their customers via Facebook and Twitter, and it's easier for consumers to influence their favorite companies through those same channels."

"You're going to see a lot more activity on this."

Another example started up last month when Organic Valley, the LaFarge, Wis., dairy cooperative, unveiled its own social networking site. The cooperative hopes customers meet up there — www.organicrising.com — to talk about sustainable food.

"We've got hundreds of people who have posted videos, poems, songs," said Sarah Bratnober, marketing director at Organic Valley.

The site has comments like the one from "frequencyoflove," who says her 9-year-old daughter has begun a campaign to start a community garden, with plans to write the mayor of their city. "She and some of her friends are putting together a group and (they) have named it ... 'Girls Gone GREEN' how cute is that!!"

"It allows the consumers, our citizen partners, to inform each other. As opposed to us always saying, 'This is what a healthy future means,' let them tell each other what a healthy future means," Bratnober said.

"If people have trouble they're more likely to turn to their friend than to some authority voice or some corporate voice," she said. "That's really been the stimulus behind a lot of social media success."

Giving customers what they want has been one of the recurring themes with the new online efforts of Minnesota's food economy. It's easier when they tell you, but some companies have ventured out with experiments that guess what customers may want.

Take Hormel Foods Corp., which rolled out a virtual kitchen at hormel.com last fall.

It includes original songs recorded in New York with musicians hired through Hormel's ad agency, Marsteller Interactive. But do people actually download the music to play on their patio for a barbecue?

"We're getting a lot more requests for music from our commercials," said Scott Weisenbeck, a manager for Hormel.

"The thing with Web sites and brands and the world we live in right now, it's really about letting the customers help us and tell us what they need and want," he said. "What we're talking about is building a better one-on-one relationship with the consumer."

The company has more things coming in the digital world, said Weisenbeck, but he wasn't ready to describe them. For now, he's happy with Hormel research that shows people spend about 10 minutes on average looking around the virtual kitchen.

"The people who do it right will build a relationship with the consumer that will last longer than any single digital tactic that we can do," he said.

Fashion icon Tim Gunn says he is happy that the legal issues that have preceded season six of the ultra popular series, "Project Runway" are over. The show is set to air Aug. 20 on Lifetime.

there, I guess you'd say."

On how he picks cover songs to record: "Covering songs is just as important as writing songs, to me," said Ward, who has recorded the likes of David Bowie's "Let's Dance," Jimmie Dale Gilmore's "Headed for a Fall" and Daniel Johnston's "To Go Home" on past albums. "I learned to play guitar by covering Beatles songs, so it feels natural. Every time you do it, you roll the dice. Certain songs feel right when you're covering them and certain songs you're only going to be playing in your basement."

On why he continues to make albums with the same four-track recorder he's had since he was a teenager: "It's great. It's cheap. It's easy. It's durable. And it has sentimental value, too. By and large, the process has stayed the same. It starts with going through old four-track tapes, finding out which songs to bring into the bigger studio. The most important thing that has changed from record to record is the sphere of influence, it's constantly growing. My bigger influence comes from older records, but as we all know, there's an endless amount of things to be discovered on older records."

On his next projects: "I'm working on two records in 2009: one with Zooey again. We had a lot of fun, and it was really inspiring. And then one with Bright Eyes and My Morning Jacket. We've been talking about doing that one for a long time, so it's time to finally do it, and I'm very excited."

On his slow but steady climb to stardom: "I like it this way. Making records has never been a question of how can I overexpose myself. It's just been a question of doing what'll inspire me. I follow my instincts. I couldn't be happier with the gradual slope of my career. If it were any steeper, I don't think I'd still be here."

M. Ward is currently working on two records for 2009. One album will be recorded with his wife, Zooey Deschanel, while the other is a collaboration with Bright Eyes and My Morning Jacket.

Q: What do you think about South Florida style?

A: "There's a lot of glamour and pizazz. A lot of great-looking women and men. I have to say, it has a very Euro feeling. But it's important for clothes to breathe, not be too clinging. Cropped pants are always worthy. Not jeans. Denim breathes, but it's not the most comfortable in scorching hot weather."

Q: Season 4 winner Christian Siriano is in town, too. Are you going to see each other?

A: "Gosh, I hope so. He so impressed us. I taught for 29 years, including the Proenza Schouler boys. He's the only one I would say is a fashion prodigy. I think he's his generation's Marc Jacobs. I have every confidence of his continued ascension to greatness."

Q: Did you hear about Season 5 finalist native Kenley Collins assaulting her ex with a cat?

A: "Oh God, yes. To be blunt, I owe it to her immaturity. If the audience had seen excerpts of what we edited out they would have turned off their televisions. She would laugh inappropriately when I made my rounds in the work room. I would call over my shoulder, 'Kenley, just stop it!' I'm now very cautious of any designer who has not had even a semester of design education. She took all of the critiquing personally."

Q: Was she your most difficult contestant?

A: "Ha! I don't know. Fashion comes with ego and big personalities. I always say if we removed every person who was high-maintenance, there would be no one left."

Q: Did you congratulate Heidi Klum on her pregnancy?

A: "Oh, no, I didn't know! She's going to rock those maternity dresses. She is such a dynamo. I love and adore her so much. As gorgeous and breathtaking she is on television, she's even more so in person. I was holding her hands once and told her, 'Even your knuckles are stunning!'"

Q: Who do you think has the best style in Hollywood?

A: "When I did ABC's Oscar show, I was amazed when I saw these people up close who I used to see only from afar and in the tabloids. Anne Hathaway and Penelope Cruz are simply staggering. Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie are otherworldly. They don't look like they should be on this planet."

Q: What can we expect from Season 6?

A: "It's a great season. I'll say there's a big-time shocker, some purported cheating. The blogs will be clogged. They won't be able to vent enough about it."

"Not how we wanted to come out, obviously," said senior midfielder Rory Pedrick of the slow start. "The defense played well but offensively we didn't execute what we wanted to do. I think we all kind of forced it at times and they caused turnovers and they went down on offense and kind of took over the game."

Although the Minutemen were displeased with their shot selection, Galloway made some big saves early to further frustrate the UMass offense.

"Our defense was stymieing them," said Galloway, who made 14 saves. "They have a really talented attack – they have one of the best duos on attack in the country and they scored two goals. We're excited to have a defensive performance like that."

UMass' Jim Connolly and Tim Balise entered the game with a combined 55 goals. But Connolly's two tallies were the only points that either scored. Ryan Marcus scored UMass' other goal.

Stephen Keogh led the Syracuse offense with three goals, while Josh Amidon added two. Five others players chipped in one, including Kenny Nims who also had three assists.

As the lead in the second half grew for Syracuse, the Orange slowed the game down, running down the clock.

"I was surprised, I probably haven't seen a Syracuse team stall that often in a game," Cannella said. "But I think with the weather they figured that would be their best opportunity."

Barring a potential meeting in the NCAA Tournament, Saturday's game was the last chance these teams will have against each other, at least for the foreseeable future.

"I don't know if this game has been the healthiest game for both teams," Syracuse coach John Desko told the Syracuse Post-Standard prior to Saturday's matchup. "So maybe a little time off might help that situation."

Cannella told the paper that he was disappointed.

"Absolutely," he said. "I was looking at it today, and we've played Syracuse every year since 1976 and twice in 1994 and 2005. You're looking at a lot of games. I'm real sad to see it end. I wish it would continue."

For now, Syracuse extends its series lead over the Minutemen to 28-8 – ending a four-game drought against UMass in Amherst.

Jim Connolly, left, and the UMass offense struggled all afternoon against Syracuse goalkeeper John Galloway, right, and the Orange. UMass went over 38 minutes at one point without a goal in the loss.

At least one UMass player would love to see them again sooner rather than later.

"You never know, we could see these guys again [in the NCAAs] – which would be a blast," Schneider said. "Rutgers is like a playoff game now and we should go in with a little edge and be a little pissed off about today and hopefully we channel that positively."

Game notes

Prior to Saturday, UMass hadn't played a game at McGuirk Stadium since a 1997 loss to Syracuse. ... Saturday's record home crowd topped the previous high of 12,143 fans that saw a 1989 loss to Syracuse.

La Salle takes series against Minutemen

Stone noted that opposing pitching depth didn't make much of a difference, as the Minutemen simply didn't capitalize on prime opportunities. The Minutemen left eight men on base Sunday, and stranded 19 throughout the weekend.

UMass (15-20, 8-9 Atlantic 10) starting pitcher Jared Freni (1-11) ran into trouble in the third inning when the first four Explorers (17-21, 6-11 A-10), reached base safely. Shortstop Brian Meagher singled up the middle, followed by a single and an error by Minuteman third baseman Sam Boone that allowed Jeff Flax to reach, loading the bases.

Freni then surrendered a two-run double to left field before striking out Chism, who is also La Salle's everyday first baseman. Flax scored before third baseman Justin Handler grounded into an inning-ending double play.

The fourth inning didn't go any easier for Freni.

He gave up a leadoff double to designated hitter Marc Schoch and then walked a batter before inducing a fielder's choice, getting the out at first base. Freni got the next batter to fly out to right-fielder Mike Donato.

Freni would get out of the inning but not before giving up a two-run single to right field. In four innings pitched, Freni allowed four earned runs on six hits, while striking out two and walking two.

UMass mustered three runs in the first seven innings but couldn't mount a late-inning comeback.

"All three of [the UMass starting pitchers this past weekend] weren't as sharp as they needed to be," Stone said of the Minutemen's problems containing the Explorers' offense, which scored no fewer than six runs in each game.

"That created some issues where we got behind early in every game. We didn't execute well enough in every facet," said Stone.

In Saturday's game, Nick Serino made his first start since tossing a complete game against Saint Joseph's on April 18, where he earned a victory in a 10-2 UMass win. Serino pitched 6-2/3 innings of five-hit baseball, giving up four runs and striking out five in the 6-5 loss.

Mike Dicato (3-3) took the loss Saturday when he gave up a sacrifice fly to Meagher, scoring Rick Gehman in the eighth inning.

Centerfielder Brian Baudinet accounted for all five UMass runs, going 1-for-3 with three RBIs and two runs scored in the loss. Right fielder Mike Donato was the only Minuteman to have a multi-hit game, going 2-for-4 with an RBI.

Friday's game was a better offensive effort by the Minutemen.

Fresh off of pitching the first complete game shutout by a Minuteman since 2005, senior Mitchell Clegg pitched 6-1/3 innings, giving up six runs on 10 hits, while striking out four and walking two.

The Minutemen have a busy week ahead of them, with five games, four of which are in Amherst at Earl Lorden Field. UMass will next play on Tuesday at 4 p.m. against Siena (10-31).

do," said Reddy, following the 14-13 victory. "I don't even know what to say, it just feels amazing."

Lyons' final goal gave UMass a 15-14 win over the Hawks (10-8) and earned the Minutewomen their first Atlantic 10 Championship since 2000 and its first trip to the NCAA Tournament since 1985.

They certainly had to work for it, overcoming a seven-goal deficit in 90 degree heat against a physical Hawks defense.

"We worked all so hard for each other," said junior attacker Stephanie Hopkins, who scored three goals in the win. "I felt like I was dying, but we all just worked together as a team."

The game got off to a promising start for the Minutemen, who jumped out to a 2-0 lead after about three minutes.

But it didn't last long as SJU went on a 10-1 run, scoring 10 goals on 12 shots to take a commanding lead.

What made the deficit especially frustrating and perplexing for UMass was still trailing despite winning nearly every draw control. The previous A-10 Tournament record for draw controls in a game was 16 – UMass won 17 in the first half and finished with a 28-6 advantage over St. Joe's. But it almost wasn't enough.

Ball security issues plagued the Minutewomen and they committed 10 turnovers in the half, negating much of their success on the draw.

"It was frustrating that we had those turnovers," said Reddy, who had 12 draw controls (a tournament record) along with three goals. "But we changed our game plan and we fixed [that]."

The Minutewomen got a burst of offense at the half, as Merritt Cosgrove, Lyons and Danielle Pelletier all scored in the final three minutes of the half, breathing life into the sidelines.

SJU added one goal before the buzzer and UMass went into halftime down 11-6, but it was a situation they had faced before.

In the Minutewomen's final regular season game, they were down 11-4 with 21 minutes remaining. The did not panic and slowly climbed back and wound up winning a 14-13 nail-biter, an experience that proved invaluable to the Minutewomen on Sunday.

"We've been in this situation before so we knew what to expect," Reddy said. "We knew we couldn't get rattled or let the refs get in our head, we just had to play our game, our way."

The Minutewomen came back in a similar fashion against St. Joe's, chipping away at the lead, cutting it to 12-8 with 21:56 left, then 13-10 with 17:36 remaining.

UMass coach Alexis Venechanos talked about how her team's resilience came from a desire to see each other succeed.

"The players love each other," Venechanos said. "We talk about how to play for each other and not to play for yourself."

In the final 15 minutes, Lyons earned her MVP trophy. She scored three of the last four goals in regulation for UMass, including an unassisted goal with 3:06 left to tie the game at 14.

"I think she 100 percent deserved [the MVP] and she'll deserve everything that she gets and everything that she has," Cosgrove said.

In the overtime period, UMass' freshman goalkeeper Katie Florence who stopped one shot in the first half, made three of her seven saves – including a point-blank shot with one minute left.

UMass then forced a turnover with 25 seconds to go and got the ball to Lyons, who flew up the field and was fouled before she put in her championship-winner.

"I prayed before [Lyons' shot], I didn't want to run back down the field again," a relieved Reddy said.

Sophomore Jackie Lyons scored the game-winning goal in overtime Sunday to help UMass beat St. Joe's in the Atlantic 10 Championship Game.

Sunday's title win was the culmination of what the Minutewomen had been working toward the entire season.

After enduring a 3-6 start due to one of the toughest schedules in the nation, UMass went 6-1 in the conference to earn the No. 1 seed in the A-10 Tournament.

Led by Lyons (two goals, three assists) and senior captain Holly Drown (three goals, assist), the Minutewomen defeated the fourth seed George Washington, 12-9, on Friday to set up Sunday's championship clash, when SJU beat two-seed Richmond, 11-10.

Venechanos said regardless of what happened Sunday she was proud of her team, but was happy to see her players get rewarded for their effort.

"This is something that they all worked hard for. We talked about it back in September," Venechanos said. "It was kind of the pink elephant in the room [all season], we hadn't really talked about it [since then] until Friday night.

"It's great for the girls, great for the whole program and for all the hard work the players put in," Venechanos added.

Game notes

After the game, Lyons, Cosgrove, Reddy and Drown were all named to the A-10 All-Tournament team. ... Sunday's game featured 76 combined fouls and four cards, including a red card on SJU's Rae Wojnar for intentionally cross-checking Reddy with five seconds left in the game. ... Jackie Rosenzweig started her 71st consecutive game, which is a UMass career record. ... Reddy's 128 career draw controls are also a school record.

Lyons dominates in final minutes, OT

Sunday's title game victory. "She has that killer instinct, that drive and she wills the ball in."

What separates a good player from a great one is wanting the ball and delivering in crunch time. Lyons did that this weekend. First, she scored the game-tying goal in regulation with about three minutes left to tie the game at 14-14. Saint Joseph's led 10-3 at one point in the first half.

Both teams fought to a stalemate until UMass forced a turnover with 25 seconds remaining in the second overtime period.

The Minutewomen quickly pushed the ball up field, and found Lyons, who raced to the goal, shoulders down, legs charging to get the winning goal. With no other choice, an SJU defender fouled her with 8.9 seconds left in overtime giving her a free-position shot.

Her teammates had a feeling the game was about to end.

"I was like 'she's got this,' There's no way she's going to miss – this girl makes them everyday in practice so she's going to make it in the game," attacker Stephanie Hopkins said.

Lyons herself wasn't quite so sure.

"I was thinking how I kept missing them all game and I knew I had to put this one away," Lyons said.

When she buried the shot, her teammates erupted off the bench in celebration.

"I knew it, I knew it. I still prayed, but I knew [her shot] was going in," senior attacker Meghan Reddy said.

The Minutewomen are now reaping the rewards of playing Lyons every minute in her freshman season. She had a productive rookie year, notching nine goals and four assists, while being named to the A-10 All Rookie Team.

But her production has skyrocketed in her sophomore year. Lyons has scored 44 goals to go along with 26 assists to lead her team in scoring. She is considered one of the best players in the conference and, in Venechanos' opinion, one of the top attackers in the entire country.

Venechanos mentioned that one of Lyons' best attributes is her big-game experience. The coach did not even bother to give Lyons a pep talk before her crucial shot.

"She knows [what to do], she's a big-time player, she's been in those situations since high school," Venechanos said. "She's been playing big games her whole life. I'm never worried that she's ready to play; she comes to play every single practice, every single day. This is another day in the life for her."

Her teammates had a similar sentiment.

"Jackie Lyons, man, she's just an awesome player. She stepped up as a sophomore and she does what ever she is told to do," Hopkins said. "No matter the time, no matter how hard we need her to play, she does it."

As intimidating as she is on the field, she is just as modest off it, deflecting all praise sent her way towards her teammates.

"It's nice, but I can't do any of it without my team members. They are always there for me," Lyons said when asked how it felt to be named the A-10 Tournament MVP.

A championship winner in just her second season, Lyons has two more years to play like a warrior. For the rest of the Atlantic 10, that's a scary thought.

The UMass women's lacrosse team poses for a picture after a thrilling 14-13 overtime victory over Saint Joseph's in Sunday's Atlantic 10 Championship Game in Philadelphia. The Minutewomen claimed their first A-10 title since 2000 and first NCAA Tournament bid since 1985.

PHILADELPHIA — It looked like the remarkable run was about to come to an end.

After going 7-1 against Atlantic 10 competition en route to a berth in the Atlantic 10 Championship game, the top-seeded Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was on the wrong side of a 10-3 score against No. 3 seed Saint Joseph's with 3 minutes, 29 seconds remaining in the first half.

St. Joe's 13

A grim situation, but the Minutewomen never stopped believing they could pull off a miracle win, exhorting each other on the sidelines to keep fighting.

Improbably, their persistence paid off as UMass (11-7) rallied back, forced overtime and pulled ahead, 14-13, with 8.9 seconds left on a free-position score by Jackie Lyons, who scored five goals and three assists earning the A-10 Tournament's Most Valuable Player Award.

Meghan Reddy won the ensuing draw control, then, following a hard foul, flung the ball high in the air as time expired sending the Minutewomen into a euphoric celebration.

"It feels remarkable; it's something I've never expected. I haven't won something like that before so I didn't really know what to

Lyons' heroics in overtime little surprise to teammates

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PHILADELPHIA — Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Alexis Venechanos describes attacker Jackie Lyons with one word: warrior.

It's a fitting description for a player who not only plays the part, but looks the part. Wearing full black war paint on both sides of her face, she is constantly charging into the center of the field, determined to score – no matter what.

Sticks flew, cross checks were a constant and the idea of women's lacrosse being a non-contact sport was mocked to the point of absurdity. Try as try might, Saint Joseph's simply couldn't stop her as she tallied five goals and three assists in UMass' 15-14 win in the Atlantic 10 Championship Game Sunday afternoon, including the championship-winning goal with 8.9 seconds left in overtime.

Lyons was voted the A-10 Tournament's Most Valuable Player for both her effort in the title game and her two-goal, three-assist day against George Washington on Friday in the semifinals.

"She has something you can't coach," Venechanos said after

49ers end run of 49 straight A-10 victories

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After winning 49 consecutive Atlantic 10 games, the No. 17 Massachusetts softball team finally lost – but the rare defeat doesn't mean much in the grand scheme of things.

Although the streak is over, it is just one loss for a team that has been unbreakable thus far and will remain at the top of A-10 play for the remainder of the season.

UMass' 11-6 Game 2 loss in the doubleheader against Charlotte was its first A-10 loss since May 5, 2006 when the Minutewomen lost, 5-3, to St. Bonaventure.

UMass split its doubleheader against Charlotte on Sunday afternoon, with a 3-0 victory in Game 1 behind another shutout from ace pitcher Brandice Balschmiter. But freshman pitcher Sarah Plourde couldn't quiet the Charlotte offense in Game 2, allowing 11 runs on 15 hits in the loss.

Charlotte 11

The loss also ended an impressive 17-game winning streak for the Minutewomen.

UMass (29-7, 11-1 A-10) started out strong in the defeat, scoring three runs in the first inning on four hits. But the 49ers (30-14, 12-4 A-10) scored four runs of their own – on three hits and an error by UMass first baseman Sarah Reeves – to quickly answer back in the bottom of the first to take the lead.

With Whitney Mollica's three-run home run off of Katy Hackett's 0-1 pitch at the top of the second, the Minutewomen went right back up, 6-4.

But those three runs were the last the Minutewomen scored for the remainder of the game.

Thanks to Charlotte's pitcher Emily Jeffery, who came in during the second inning in relief, the 49ers shut out the Minutewomen and handed them their first A-10 loss in almost three years. Jeffery held UMass to four hits and struck out five in just over five innings on the mound.

In the bottom of the second inning, Charlotte once again answered back with four more runs, taking an 8-6 lead. UMass' bats remained stagnant, and the 49ers tallied a run in the third and three more in the fifth and sixth innings to end the game with the 11-6 victory.

Despite allowing a season-high 15 hits, Plourde didn't receive much help from her defense – which committed a season-high tying four errors.

That was not a problem in Game 1 for UMass with Balschmiter on the mound. The senior star allowed only four hits while striking out eight in the Minutewomen's 3-0 win.

UMass jumped out to a quick 2-0 lead on the bat of Whitney Williams. Williams sent a pitch from Jeffery to straightaway center field, driving in Carly Normandin, who doubled to leadoff the game.

Jeffery's counterpart on the mound cruised along for most of the game.

Balschmiter run into some trouble in the bottom half of the second inning. After a third strike to Cee Brooks got away from catcher Jessica Serio, Brooks safely reached first. Reeves committed a fielding error next, which allowed Keri Palma to reach base. After Jaime West reached on a fielders' choice, Balschmiter got Lorena Vela and Sarah Malene to fly and ground out, retiring the side.

Williams drove in another UMass run in the third inning.

With one out in the inning Normandin reached base again, this time doubling to right field. Williams followed up Normandin's extra-base hit with her own, sending the ball down the right field line and driving in the junior.

Balschmiter finished off the game not surrendering a hit in the final two innings.

The win improved Balschmiter's record to 21-4 and her earned-run average to 1.18.

The Minutewomen play their next game on Tuesday in a doubleheader at Rhode Island.

Record crowd watches UMass fall to heated rival Syracuse

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Travis Tripucka is relatively new to the Massachusetts-Syracuse men's lacrosse rivalry. But one has to wonder if the sophomore defender knew exactly what he was doing when he completely flattened a Syracuse player in the third quarter.

The victim of the vicious hit? None other than Tim Desko, the freshman son of Syracuse coach John Desko – the same John Desko who, at least temporarily, wants to end the 34-year rivalry.

The knockdown hit had to have been an extra-special one for Tripucka and the Minutemen, but that was about all UMass enjoyed in a 10-3 loss to second-ranked and defending national champion Syracuse on Saturday before a record home crowd of 13,722 at McGuirk Stadium.

Syracuse 10
UMass 3

The No. 16 Minutemen led 2-1 early, but a stifling Syracuse defensive effort led to seven unanswered goals during a 38-minute scoreless stretch for UMass, which couldn't overcome the offensive firepower of the Orange.

"This game is about opportunities. We had opportunities, we didn't finish them. And when you play a team like Syracuse, you have to," UMass coach Greg Cannella said after the game. "I'm not sure we shot the ball very well today, but [SU goalkeeper] John Galloway hung in there and made great saves."

Syracuse (11-2) capitalized on virtually all of its opportunities in the second half to cruise to victory and a likely No. 1 spot in the national polls. The non-conference loss may cost UMass a chance at an at-large berth into the NCAA Tournament, but the Minutemen can still get in with a win Saturday at Rutgers, which would give them the ECAC title and automatic NCAA qualifier.

UMass (8-5, 5-1 ECAC) would tie Loyola atop the standings with a win over the Scarlet Knights, but would claim the ECAC crown by virtue of its 8-6 win over the Greyhounds on March 21.

Syracuse, meanwhile, already has spot secured. After struggling early in Saturday's game against UMass goalkeeper and All-American candidate Doc Schneider (17 saves), the Orange eventually broke through in a decisive third quarter.

The deep and talented Syracuse offense continued to snipe goals in the third period while UMass remained stagnant offensively. Schneider didn't make a save as the Orange scored on all four shots on goal. Once the Minutemen ended the seven-goal Syracuse spurt and 38 minute, 19 second scoring drought at the 1:18 mark, it was too late.

UMass sophomore midfielder Stephen Zorkers tries to maneuver around a Syracuse player during Saturday afternoon's game before a home record crowd of 13,722. The No. 16 Minutemen lost to defending national champion and second-ranked Syracuse, 10-3, at McGuirk Stadium.

Win streak over, UM falls to La Salle

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite starting the weekend riding an impressive four-game winning streak, the Massachusetts baseball team couldn't find an answer against the La Salle Explorers.

Early trouble cost the Minutemen on both Saturday and Sunday. UMass dropped the final game of the series, 7-3, after losing on Saturday. The Minutemen did take Game 1, 9-6.

The bulk of the Explorers' runs in the three-game series came in the early innings, forcing UMass to work from behind. In this weekend's games the Minutemen gave up a combined 12 runs in the first three innings.

Despite struggles offensively in the final two games, UMass coach Mike Stone felt that no La Salle pitcher was particularly overpowering.

"We didn't hit the ball consistently well," said Stone.

"The only kid who I was somewhat impressed with was the kid who came in relief today, [TJ] Chism," added Stone after Sunday's loss. "He threw the ball hard and had a pretty good breaking ball. We didn't do much at all [against] him."

Chism is one of the nine Explorer pitchers used in the weekend series, eight of which only appeared in one game.

Neal faces competition

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts journalism professor and former Springfield mayor Congressman Richard Neal will face a challenger for his second district house seat for the first time since 1998.

Republican Jay Fleitman, chairman of Northampton's Board of Health, a Republican ward chairman, and a former school committee member will run against Neal, who has held his seat since 1989.

Fleitman said he is running for a variety of reasons, but primarily because he disagrees with Congress' recent spending moves.

"They've let loose with this almost criminal barrage of spending," Fleitman said of the federal bailouts, furthering that "this government is accruing debt equal to the entire debt that the US government has accrued in history prior to this."

"The chickens are going to come to roost on this, it's going to burden the whole economy, the people who are going to be paying for this are you and your children," continued Fleitman as an emphasis to students.

Fleitman specifically targeted current spending trends by Democrats in Washington as a reason for his move, stating that recent government bailouts create a slippery slope towards nationalization of larger industries, like healthcare, a subject of particular interest to Fleitman, who is a certified doctor in internal, pulmonary and sleep medicine and the former president of medical staff at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

"I'm concerned about where the government is going in regards to the healthcare system," he continued. "A governmental takeover of the healthcare system is not in the government's interests; there are a number of countries in the world that have the system they're discussing in Washington and those have been failures."

"I don't think having a government bureaucrat telling you what health care you're going to get is any more attractive than having an agent of the insurance company telling you what health care you're going to get," Fleitman said of the proposed state-run healthcare.

Fleitman also cited education reform as an issue of interest.

"I'm a firm believer in charter schools, vouchers," said Fleitman. "I think the teachers' union has such a stranglehold on American education and they're resisting reforms," adding that he was disappointed that the federal budget had nixed educational vouchers for struggling schools in the Washington area.

Incumbent Springfield Congressman and UMass professor Richard Neal, above, will be challenged by Dr. Jay Fleitman of Northampton.

Fleitman hopes, however, that limiting government will be the issue which propels him to Washington.

"The thing that got me off the proverbial chair has to do with what's clearly an initiative on the part of this congress to expand government, and I'm a firm believer that what makes this country exceptional, what's valued in the U.S. and what's supposed to be protected and promoted by the

The country's 14th largest paper, The Boston Globe lost a reported $50 million in 2008 and is on track to lose $85 million more this year. It faces being shut down by The New York Times Co. unless it makes sizeable budget and staffing cuts.

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

(Editor's Note: This is part two of a three-part series. Readers can view parts one and two today on DailyCollegian.com. The final part will be published tomorrow in print and online.)

One hundred and twenty newspapers across the nation have closed their doors this year, and a total of 16,000 reporters lost employment in 2008 – a trend with no end in sight.

In February, The Rocky Mountain News in Denver, Colo., shut down after 150 years of operation. Hopeful to move the publication's readers to the Web, 30 of the Rocky Mountain News' former editorial staff members planned to launch 1NDenverTimes.com on May 4 with a goal of 50,000 subscriptions to fund the operation. A week ago, site developers revealed around 3,000 people pledged to subscribe, which caused some of the staff to abandon the idea, jeopardizing the project's future.

The Christian Science Monitor has switched from a daily print paper to a weekly, online news source. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer ceased print as well to focus on the Web.Meanwhile, The Hartford Courant, The Chicago Tribune, The Chicago Sun-Times, The Los Angeles Times, The Philadelphia Inquirer and The Minneapolis Star-Tribune are among a list of well-known regional newspapers who have filed for bankruptcy recently.

So, why are many newspapers' profits plummeting?

The main reason is advertising. Readership has declined, but companies are investing less in advertising due to the weak economy. And, when companies are investing, most look to the Internet, TV or radio – not print – and the majority of news websites do not generate enough revenue to make a profit. Classified ads and job postings have moved online as well, to sites like Craigslist, which allow users free or cheaper listings than newspaper classifieds.

As the country's 14th largest paper, The Boston Globe – which is owned by The New York Times Co. – lost a reported $50 million in 2008 and is on track to lose $85 million more this year. If it closes shop, which the Times Co. has threatened to do, it will be the largest paper to do so.

"TIMES PIMPS, PILLAGES GLOBE"

How serious The New York Times Co.'s threats are, no one really knows; or, at least, the people who do know aren't talking.

The Times Co. has refused to talk about the threat other than confirming the deadline date, while Globe management have said little on the looming deadline and negotiation process.

"We are in the midst of negotiations with our unions. Because of that, we are going to decline to comment," said an e-mail from senior vice president of corporate communications at The Peter Manseau always wanted to be Indiana Jones.

While not an adventurous archeologist, he still likes to think that he has a few things in common with the movie icon.

"Indiana Jones always takes religious relics and says, 'This belongs in a museum,'" said Manseau. "I like to take religion and say, 'This belongs in a story.'"

Manseau is a writer of novels, memoirs and religion, as well as a 1996 University of Massachusetts graduate. He describes himself as a garden-variety 21st-century agnostic skeptic when it comes to religion, although his memoir, "Vows," was about his Catholic parents, a former nun and priest.

He came back to his alma mater Monday to give a speech entitled "Collecting Gods: Why Telling Stories About Other People's Beliefs Might Just Save the World."

"I go to places where people believe strange things, which is basically everywhere, and I learn things, come back, and write about it, and hopefully I get paid for it," said Manseau.

The first year that Manseau attended UMass, he was not on the path that eventually led him to writing and studying different religions.

"I wanted desperately to be an archeologist," said Manseau. "Even more, I wanted to be Indiana Jones."

Unfortunately, his first professor came into class dressed as the character and immediately told the class that Indy was not real, and his practice was not real archeology. Disappointed with the fact that his fantasy would not become a reality, Manseau changed his course to something else.

"Writing allows and encourages the blending of reality and fantasy," said Manseau.

Writer Peter Manseau, above, spoke on campus on Monday.

Using the Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) program, Manseau created his own major, Literature and Religious Thought, deciding to write about people and the religious beliefs that they hold.

"There is some very real tension built into the task of writing on religion," said Manseau.

Manseau spoke mostly about his first book, "Killing the Buddha: A Heretic's Bible," written with journalist Jeff Sharlet about a cross-country trip that led them to interesting people and religious beliefs.

"We shouldn't trust our assumptions when it comes to religious beliefs," said Manseau.

He illustrated his point by talking about some of the different people he met on his journey. One was a woman from Colorado who invited him and Sharlet to a pagan festival in Kansas where clothing was optional.

"There is nothing like driving through Kansas with silos and church steeples and then spending some time with thousands of naked

Fifteen University of Massachusetts students forwent the usual vacation spots and spent their spring break on a community service trip in Nicaragua.

The trip was funded by donations from University of Massachusetts Hillel and an organization called American Jewish World Service (AJWS), which set up a community service project for the students attending.

While in Nicaragua, the students built a road and a bridge that will lead to a school being built to educate adults who did not have the chance to receive a general education. The school is the 17th built in Nicaragua as part of the projects of AJWS.

Students also attended educational sessions intended to connect the work to Jewish values.

"The educational sessions also served as a debriefing to all the work we were doing," said Ariela Lovett, a sophomore from Mount Holyoke College, who went on the trip.

Julie Pulda, a UMass student, found out about this program through UMass' Hillel while concurrently doing volunteer work in South Africa.

"We worked alongside local students and members of the community every day. When we were not working, we spent time visiting local communities and schools or just hanging out with community members," said Pulda. "We also had daily education sessions about poverty in Third World countries. We tried to understand these serious issues by both working in the community and discussing the topics."

Though spring break opportunities have been offered through UMass's Hillel in past years, this was the first year that students had the opportunity to go to Nicaragua. The group consisted of undergraduates, graduate students and one group leader.

"Working the whole week and spending all day Saturday at the school, the students stayed about five minutes from the worksite in an open, concrete structure. The girls stayed in one room and the boys stayed in

On whether his campaign will present a legitimate threat to Rep. Neal, Fleitman was energetic and optimistic.

"I'm not in this to make a statement," he said. "I'm in this to win."

"I've been continually and pleasantly surprised in my dealings with people in Northampton and surrounding areas in how independent they are in their thinking," Fleitman said, explaining that he thinks western Massachusetts can be fertile ground for a Republican politician despite its leftward slant.

"District 2 voted heavily for Romney when he was elected and a lot of the towns went to Healey in the last election, you know," he continued. "So, I think if the voters see I'm their type of candidate and have positions comfortable to them, it'll be a viable race."

On whether the Fleitman campaign poses a challenge, Representative Neal's staff was silent, as his press secretary, William Tranghese, would not comment on the matter.

UMass Chair of Political Science John Hird said that Fleitman stood a chance but that the odds favor an incumbent.

"Sylvio Conti was a long-time Republican legislator from Western MA, so it certainly can be done," he said, regarding a Republican winning in Western Massachusetts, but "it's tough to unseat any incumbent, however."

another. They slept on mattresses on the floor and did not have access to a bathroom. Moreover, there were animals including cows, horses, chickens and dogs everywhere," said Pulda.

Funding for alternative spring breaks such as the community service trip to Nicaragua is raised through events sponsored by UMass Hillel. One such event is "Ride to Provide," a bike ride charity event, which takes place in September.

"There were many aspects to the trip from peers forming friendships to learning about the culture of Nicaragua. The people who went on the trip built a community amongst themselves by sharing a common experience. Furthermore, it is a great opportunity because one is able to learn by experience not by a textbook," said Ariel Weissburg, member of Hillel and group leader of the trip.

Times Co., Catherine Mathis.

The Boston Newspaper Guild has tried to urge The Times Co. and Globe management to allow the negotiations to be done in public, but both sides have refused so far.

Former Globe columnist Eileen McNamara called The Times Co.'s silence, "a curious position for a newspaper that's in the information business."

McNamara worked at the Boston publication for 30 years, including 10 as a columnist, and earned a Pulitzer Prize in Commentary in 1997. Feeling that she had "sort of run [her] course" at The Globe, in 2007 the North Cambridge native took a buyout to teach journalism full time at Brandeis University, where she had been working part-time since 1994.

Three days after The Times Co. announced its threat to shutter The Globe, The Boston Herald published McNamara's column, "Times pimps, pillages Globe," which resonated with many Globe employees — both journalists and those on the production end.

McNamara received calls or e-mails thanking her for the piece because "they felt that, in part, the column in The Herald was speaking for them, too," she said.

Summarizing her column, she said, "I don't think The New York Times cares about The Boston Globe. I don't think it ever did, except as an economic engine that was going to pump money into New York. And since they've bought the paper, they've done nothing but strip it of the things that made it a distinctive newspaper."

The scenario of ownership trying to cut back or close its publications altogether is common across the country, but what she said distinguishes The Globe's situation is that its owners are direct competitors in the newspaper business.

Since the Charles H. Taylor family sold their local ownership of The Globe to Times Co. CEO Arthur O. Sulzberger for $1.1 billion in 1993, The Globe has faced several rounds of layoffs, pay cuts and buyouts.

The Globe's three remaining foreign bureaus were closed in 2007 and the Boston paper has just its Washington, D.C., bureau left outside of the offices in Massachusetts. The daily editions of 80 to 90 pages from 10 years ago are now 50 to 60 pages, Globe photographer George Rizer pointed out.

"The Paper of Record," as The New York Times is sometimes referred to, has had financial troubles of its own. Shares have dropped from a high of more than $50 in 2002 to about $5 now. In March, 100 Times Co. employees were laid off and salaries were cut by 5 percent. Earlier this month, The Times Co. reported a loss of $74.5 million and revenue dropped 19 percent in the first quarter of 2009.

Harvard creates Rover 'app.'

By Laura M. Fontanills
Harvard Crimson

Even Harvard's most directionally-challenged may never get lost in the Square again.

Harvard Student Agencies recently launched Rover, a free iTunes application that provides users with the locations of hundreds of restaurants and stores in the Cambridge-Boston area.

Rover also gives users live access to numerous deals and discounts in the SQuare exclusive to Rover users.

The application, available for use on the newest versions of the Apple iPhone and iTouch, uses the Unofficial Guide to Student Life at Harvard, a guidebook published by HSA, as its main source of information.

The book has reviews of over 900 establishments in Cambridge and Boston.

"There are lots of good reviews, but would you ever bring a guidebook with you when you went out?" said Winston X. Yan '10, co-creator of Rover.

Rover uses GPS to pinpoint locations of interest according to the user's specifications. It sorts all hits by distance from the user and displays relevant contact information for the selected establishment as well as maps of the surrounding area.

Rover follows in the vein of similar iTunes applications at Duke and Stanford, but, according to co-creator Alexander G. Bick '10, "Stanford and Duke have applications that are more focused on student academic life than student social life"—providing an interface to access grades, on-campus happenings, and other campus-based information.

"From the outset we tried to take the great content that is in the Unofficial Guide and make it more easily usable, searchable, and accessible for students as opposed to focusing on student academic life," Bick said.

Bick and Yan came up with the idea for Rover one year ago while visiting London.

"We were both doing research in Europe, and when we got together, we realized how useful it would be to have a guidebook on a cell phone instead of in paperback form," Bick said.

Bick and Yan, engineering and physics concentrators, respectively, used the programming knowledge they learned in Computer Science 50: "Introduction to Computer Science I" to design the application.

Writer focuses on religion

pagans," said Manseau.

While there, he talked to the different pagans and observed everything they were doing.

At one point, Manseau said he asked a woman if they would get to the actual religious practices, and she responded that the entire festival was for their religion, but decided to call upon a god anyway.

While listening to the pagans call forth a god, Manseau listened to their reasons for bringing down the god, which he said did not differ from people of any other religion.

It was for people who had problems with family, money or employment.

"In telling some of those stories, we get closer to understanding the people," said Manseau.

In Texas, the writer described how he met George, a fundamentalist geologist who had all sorts of education relating to the age of the Earth, but still believed entirely in the Bible.

Somehow, the rancher was able to reconcile the two beliefs. While he believed Genesis was the start, he believed that there were other cycles of life before that were just not written about.

"I really liked the story of George the geologist/preacher," said junior Melissa Fulham. "I'm a science major and sometimes it is difficult to find a balance between science and religion."

Manseau chose in the second part of his talk to tell stories about some of the things he wrote in his newest book, "Rag and Bones: A Journey Among the World's Holy Dead."

Much of the book is about how important religious relics are to people, important enough to start riots and cause bombings.

Religious relics are worth a lot, and according to Manseau, they are worth even more when they are stolen.

"Communities would make up stories about how they stole religious relics, even if they bought it, to show how they were so faithful and religious that they were willing to steal religious relics," said Manseau.

What Manseau calls "furta sacra," or sacred larceny, has been happening in all religions for hundreds of years, and so he told a few stories about the practice.

He told the audience about how a bishop from England once bit off the fingers from the remains of Mary Magdalene to bring them back to his church, and when asked why he did it, the bishop said that if eating the body of Christ and drinking his blood is all right, then the same rules likely apply to His saints. It seems that logic passed.

"The act of stealing religious relics, or furta sacra, is not just some crazy Christian thing," said Manseau. "It happens in religions all over the world."

He continued with another story about a monk who stole a tooth from Buddha's ashes once, and that same tooth ended up in a temple in Sri Lanka, leading to the attempted bombing of the temple.

When hairs from the Prophet Muhammad were stolen, it caused riots. Furta sacra is still practiced, although there seems to be more armed guards around religious relics today.

Although Manseau admitted that he believes he is prying sometimes, he still thinks that understanding other religions is important.

"While I occasionally have doubts, the reason I keep writing about these people is because, not only do I own these stories, but they own me as well," said Manseau.

Some of the people in the audience were glad Manseau had that outlook on religion.

"His beliefs are similar to a lot of kids on campus," said UMass sophomore Liz Hall. "I think that the idea of learning about other religions is really good, instead of just saying that other religions are all nonsense."

Manseau is a lecturer in the journalism department at Georgetown University, where he is also studying for a doctoral degree in religion.

Amazing grace

On any given day on the UMass campus, there are countless interactions between people. During my career here as a student for the past two years, there hasn't been a day on campus where I successfully stayed in complete isolation. It might actually be statistically impossible, considering the more than 26,000 students are crammed like sardines into this cement jungle. We're just bound to see people.

Some interactions don't evolve much more than some awkward eye contact or maybe even the standard "cool guy head nod." The bicyclist who seeks my blood as road kill will undoubtedly make my day worse.

But that simple friendly gesture or the sight of a close friend throughout my travels on campus is extremely encouraging and can be the extra cherry on top that makes the walk from the Southwest Residential Area to the Lederle Graduate Research Center that much more bearable. There was this one interaction I had with a woman that I'll never forget.

It wasn't because she was a good friend of mine – in fact, I never caught her name. It was what she did that blew my mind.

I was getting a bit hungry so I decided to take a little stroll downstairs from the MacKimmie dormitory in Southwest and try my luck at the Berkshire Dining Commons. I stood in a line of about seven or eight kids who were having their cards swiped with superb patience (not to offend the Berkshire Dining Commons staff; they were merely doing their job of matching each identification card with its owner with the precision of a customs officer at Logan International Airport). Seven minutes and six people later, I found myself one person away from swiping into the all-you-can-eat food playground when suddenly I came to the realization that I had forgotten my I Card in my dorm.

Rain clouds instantly rolled in over my head as I began to curse my own stupidity. I pecked over my shoulder and was far from comforted to see a line that had experienced miraculous growth during my wait.

Then, out of nowhere, came the interaction that I've been building up to. The woman in front of me said three words that would grant me access to gluttonous freedom: "guest swipe please."

Let's talk about grace for a minute here. Grace seems to be a word that's thrown around a lot but never truly understood. We use the word to refer to kindness, compassion or even that cute girl in histology class.

I used to think that grace was mercy but soon learned that it is quite different. Where mercy is not getting something that you deserve, grace is simply getting something that you do not deserve.

When you acted out in third grade and clearly deserve a 15-minute staring contest with a corner but are not forced into one by your teacher, you experienced mercy. When you sit in class daydreaming about being a rock star and your teacher brings in ice cream sandwiches for everyone, you experience grace.

With only 15 guest swipes to use for friends and family throughout the semester, it is not common for a student to guest-swipe another student in. Throw in the fact that we have never met and I have my own meal plan – this act of "grace" from that wonderful woman seems almost illogical and could arguably be just plain stupid. But that's grace – it rarely makes sense.

When the Berkshire staff member hit that "Guest" button and swiped the woman's card a second time, I was in awe.

Where mercy is not getting something that you deserve, grace is simply getting something that you do not deserve.

I don't think humans are used to experiencing grace and you could tell from my knee-jerk responses. I'm not a psychologist, but from what I can tell there are three things that the victim of grace will try and do: deny it, earn it and accept it.

"Wait, you don't have to do that," I finally managed to get out after the card was already swiped. "I can just go get my card." Denial that I deserved or needed the guest swipe failed. She smiled at me and said, "Don't worry about it."

She began to walk away into the dining commons and I chased after her. "Can I give you a guest swipe? You know, to use in the future for a friend?" She laughed at me and said, "Really, it's nothing." With that she spun around and strolled away. My sad attempt to earn her grace failed. All I could do at that point was try to accept what just happened.

Your interactions with people go a long way. You could lead people into a spiral of anger and depression, or fill someone with happiness that spreads on to other people. Make the best use of your head nods, smiles and guest swipes in a culture that is utterly dumfounded in the face of anything free, including a genuine act of niceness. You'd be surprised at how much of an impact you can have.

In the event that the woman who inspired this article is reading this, Thank You.

Protecting higher education

We all know the economy is in terrible shape, and many of us are feeling it in a very immediate way as family members are laid off and as we struggle to find work ourselves. But, there is a reason to celebrate.

Last week, the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee issued its proposed budget for fiscal year 2010. The proposed budget is not pretty, there is a $3 billion deficit, and social services of all kinds have been slashed.

Emily Bloch

All predictions were that public higher education would suffer badly. The good news: The committee 's proposal matches Gov. Deval Patrick 's and maintains the operating budgets of the state college, community college, and UMass systems at the levels they were at before the mid-year budget cuts we experienced this year.

The Ways and Means committee recognized the drastic effects of the mid-year cuts and states in its summary, "As a result of the mid-year budget reductions, the University of Massachusetts and our state and community colleges sustained cumulative losses of $53.4M over the course of the current fiscal year [fiscal year 2009]. The Committee recognizes the burden that these reductions have placed on the Commonwealth's public institutions of higher learning."

In addition the budget calls for the state to use federal stimulus funds to "prevent layoffs, reinstate services and – most importantly – keep higher education affordable."

This is our victory.

Students, staff and faculty at UMass Amherst have been working all semester with partners from state and community colleges and the rest of the UMass system to organize our people and exercise power with Gov. Patrick and the state Legislature. We organized call-in days and demonstrations and met with legislators to explain why it is so important – now more than ever – to support accessible public higher education.

Keeping public education accessible and affordable is an essential step toward improving the economy in the long run.

But we should not celebrate too much. Public higher education has been underfunded in this state for decades. This budget doesn't move us forward. It just means that we will not slip much further back. Despite the good news in terms of campus operating budgets, there is also bad news for higher education.

In the Ways and Means Committee's budget proposal, the line item for Massachusetts State Scholarship Programs, which includes MASSGrant, the state's largest need-based financial aid program, has been cut by 14 percent, from $97 million to $83 million.

This means that unless students and supporters of higher education speak up, it is likely that the amount of money available for MassGrant will be reduced, canceling out the $3 million increase that was won by Massachusetts Students Uniting (MSU), the Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts (PHENOM) and others last year.

Many people are asking a good question: Should we be fighting so hard for education when so many other state services are suffering? The answer is a clear yes.

Various studies have shown that public investment in public higher education yields direct, long-term benefits to the state's economy. And it makes sense: When more people can obtain a degree, more people can get higher-paying jobs, and over 80 percent of graduates of public institutions stay in Massachusetts.

When the state helps students pay for school, fewer people graduate with dangerous levels of debt. PHENOM, MSU and the thousands of students, staff and faculty who have spoken out this year are not representing a selfish special interest. Keeping public education accessible and affordable is an essential step toward improving the economy in the long run.

The proposed budgets set an important precedent in that they recognize this fact and mark the first time Massachusetts has not cut higher education in a time of crisis. This is not a random occurrence. It has occurred because of the work that students, faculty and staff from across the state have done and continue to do to protect public higher education.

Fine line for dormitory fire-code violations

Jon Peterson

How much responsibility do University of Massachusetts administrators expect each dormitory resident to assign to each other and themselves? None.

How closely does the Amherst Fire Department expect students to follow the fire code? Not very close at all.

On Feb.26, a dorm resident on the second floor of the Baker dormitory in the Central Residential Area, hit a pipe and sprinkler in their room on the second floor of the building. This caused the sprinkler to go off, after which the Amherst Fire Department was called. By the time that they had arrived and turned off the water and electricity to the affected places, a large portion of the first and second floors of the wing of the dorm, where it had happened in, had been thoroughly flooded. The water had gone through the crack under the initial room's door, into other rooms and through the hall. A number of rooms on the first floor were leaked into as well.

Officials from the University of Massachusetts and AFD proceeded to check many of the rooms in the building for fire hazards, such as bags over smoke detectors or clothes on the pipes in the rooms.

UMass resident hall contracts state, "The University may enter student rooms without notice if it has reason to believe a health or safety emergency exists."

The housing department of the University is, at its most fundamental level, interested in the safety of the students. Its obligation is in keeping all the students safe while in their dorms, and in this case, a student had caused an emergency by the fairly common activity of putting clothes up on the pipe in their room.

This responsibility of the University to ensure the safety of the students in its dorms is clear, and as a result, people living in the dorms should have virtually no expectation to privacy. If the University deems it to be reasonable, they have the right to declare a safety emergency whenever they want.

Does it suck? Yes. Is this way of thinking worth it? Yes.

Many students here could afford to play it just a bit safer, even if only taking down the bags from their smoke detectors when they're not in the rooms.

The net result of the procedure of checking rooms is a net benefit to all the students. Water plus electricity equals fire.

And during an interview, Captain Bill Klaus Jr., who had led the firefighters in the dorm, said that approximately "50 percent of the rooms" had fire code violations, and there were "3 rooms with covered smoke detectors." And firefighters returned multiple times over the coming weeks, and conducted searches of the rooms, at random intervals, to make sure the violations had "stayed fixed."

The University checks many of the dorm rooms on much of the campus – during winter break. While this is generally enough to satisfy their responsibility to student safety, it also leaves students more than enough time to hide things, and make safe their rooms. It may help that those who check the rooms are allowed to cite people only for things in "plain view."

Many students do, however, no matter how wise their decision, put bags back over their smoke detectors and hang clothes, lights and tapestries from and around the room's pipes when they return from Winter Break. This only goes to further prove that the AFD's belief in safety hazards was warranted.

This creates a hazard to the public good of everyone who lives in the dorms, and the AFD and UMass were covering themselves from possible lawsuits, which might further raise student fees, by conducting their searches.

The citations they made while at the dorm, however, are a different story. Immediately after turning off the water in the dorms and turning off the electricity, the AFD entered other rooms and found that 50 percent of them had fire code violations: This led the officials to give out citations to many of the students in the dorm.

Massachusetts General Law 148, Section 5 says that the fire marshal, or anyone he asks to, can " ... make an investigation as to the existence of conditions likely to cause fire." After that, "They shall, in writing, order such conditions to be remedied," and "If said order is not complied with within twenty-four hours, [whoever makes the order] may enter into such building" to fix the problem, and to fine up to $50 per violation.

This allows for the written warning, im plying that the people should be given only a fine after being asked and not having removed from their room whatever item violated policy.

William Korniotes, a Baker dorm resident who received a citation, says that he and his roommate each received $100 fines, for a single infraction. Many others reported similar fines.

Our firefighters are heroes, and these men could very well have been saving lives by checking and making sure the dorms were safe. Many students here could afford to play it just a bit safer, even if only taking down the bags from their smoke detectors when they're not in the rooms.

But should they be fining people for something that even the University allows a three-strike policy for, which is clearly dictated over in the general laws? And is this lack of a right to privacy great enough to push people away from living in these dormitories? Like death and taxes, only time and the courts can decide.

When the bailout for Genral Motors goes bust

Stop the presses!

It only took a few months for $15 billion of bailout money to be officially wasted. According to a report on April 13, the U.S. Treasury Department is directing General Motors to prepare itself for filing for bankruptcy by a June 1 deadline.

Alex Perry

This is the same General Motors that President Barack Obama, Speaker Nancy Pelosi and their crew of flunkies have continuously and firmly said we can't afford to let go into bankruptcy. That's why we were told they were getting the bailout money in the first place.

Apparently this is what Republicans were talking about when they said you have to look beyond Obama's rhetoric. He says one thing, and then he does something completely different. He said we couldn't afford to let GM file for bankruptcy but now he is basically telling them to do so. Big surprise.

I actually am happy we aren't giving more taxpayer money to GM and the rest of the automakers.

I don't think we should be throwing more good money at failing industries. I'm happy Obama is making himself look had again, like Republicans said he would.That just betters the country's chances of understanding liberal policies toward the economy that never work, have no precedent for working and never will work.

What I am annoyed with, however, is the fact that we have already sunk $15 billion into this thing when any reasonable person like myself could've told you from the get-go that bankruptcy was always an option for them.

One of the arguments made by liberals in defense oAf the hailout for the auto industry was that no one is going to buy a car from a bankrupt company. But, there is literally no precedent to make that kind of statement.

There are, however, plenty of examples throughout our country's history of companies filing for bankruptcy, re-organizing and then moving forward successfully.

Take the airline industry, for example. About four years ago, major carriers including Delta and Northwest filed for bankruptcy.

Now, a few years later, these same companies are doing fine and are in a much better position then they were before bankruptcy.

Money isn't the auto industry's biggest problems – it's just one of them. We have already seen $15 billion do nothing, why should more money be wasted?

People didn't stop flying on the planes of airlines that had filed for bankruptcy, just like they wouldn't hesitate to buy cars from bankrupt auto companies.

Obama and his administration know this now, and they knew this before this bailout.

So why have waited to act on this common knowledge $15 billion later?

I have a few guesses, but I can only speculate. One is just the obvious corruption reason. The labor unions were a strong supporter of Obama during the campaign and they stand to take a big hit if the automakers go broke.

Obama would've rather seen taxpayer dollars postpone this inevitable conclusion for the auto industry even if it meant that wasn't in the best interest of taxpayers or the banks making the loans.

It's actually funny to me that people are making the argument that the reason the auto industry is failing is because the banks that have received bailout money aren't making loans to the auto industry.

Excuse me? Why would the banks, who are trying to be wise with taxpayer dollars, throw money at failing auto industry firms? These loans would never be paid back. Money isn't the auto industry's biggest problems – it's just one of them. We have already seen $15 billion do nothing, why should more money be wasted?

The banks here are actually being responsible and recognizing that the loans they would make to the auto industry would never be paid back and therefore would be bad for both taxpayers and the banks.

The same liberal nuts who criticized the banks and the CEOs for being irresponsible and reckless with their loans are now the ones demanding they give money to failing businesses. These people have to listen to themselves talk.

The other reason I think Obama insisted on bailing out the industry even though he knew it wasn't going to work is simply what I have stated previously, he wants government to have even more power. He wants government to control the auto industry – what cars they make, and what cars you drive.

He wants to be able to determine who should be a CEO and who shouldn't be. Ultimately, as I have stated before, I believe Obama's overall goal with regard to the economy is to get it moving forward again – but he thinks the only surefire way to do that is to give government as much control over the economy as possible. I just fear this plan is going to bust too.

Nearly 30 years ago, just approaching his graduation date, Mark Wilding prepared to leave campus "having spent three good years in Amherst trying to scale (not figure out) the maze," said Wilding in one of his humor columns for The Daily Collegian. "But the place still has questions, which to [his] mind, will never be answered."

In the time Wilding has spent achieving success in Hollywood as a lead writer and executive producer of "Grey's Anatomy," the very questions he posed in one of his final humor columns in The Daily Collegian remain unanswered.

Why do they charge a dime (now a quarter) for hot water at the coffee shops around campus? Why don't they paint the two Whitmore flagpoles? Why don't the windows in Herter open? Why doesn't the Campus Center Hotel offer Friday Night specials? And why do classrooms in Bartlett and Machmer have blackboards on the side-walls?

The campus was undoubtedly a much different place at the time: Jimmy Carter had just taken office, the legal drinking age was 18, the Blue Wall was a bar and bricks were falling from the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, but some things remain the same. For instance, Wilding seemed surprised to learn that the library still stands, exclaiming, "Wait it's the same one!" Though Wilding admits, "I was a terrible economics major," he indulged his long-standing interest in writing by taking English classes at Smith College and writing his weekly column in The Collegian.

Even then, through his column, Wilding said, "I was always trying to entertain."

Today he remains true to the same sense of entertaining, working 12-hour days to maintain the popularity of "Grey's Anatomy," for which he has received multiple Emmy nominations, won a Writer's Guild of America Award and was nominated for another, and won a Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation award, in addition to gaining an enormous fan following for the show.

Following his graduation, Wilding dreamed of going into journalism with a focus in economics writing.

"That was my first big mistake on my career path to being a TV writer, studying Econ.," he joked. When he first entered the real world, Wilding briefly explored jobs ranging from a Stop & Shop clerk, to sports editor for a small Atlanta newspaper.

Wilding said that when he was 27 he was still working as a sports editor and "wasn't getting paid very much money and I was stuck in the middle of Georgia and I had always liked movies, so I moved out to Los Angeles." When he arrived in L.A. he took a job as a buyer for a department store but admits he "really, really hated it."

All the while he continued to write.

"I wrote a bunch of bad screenplays that never got made and never even sold," he said. But Wilding kept at it. "You've got to be pretty thick-skinned [in this business.] There's a lot of rejection."

In his early 30s he submitted a play he wrote based on the Bhopal gas leak in India to a playwright's festival called "The Company Man," in Santa Rosa, Calif. After winning a festival award, the show was performed in Los Angeles, where Disney executives saw it and approached Wilding to see how he would like to write for television. Though it wasn't until Wilding turned 35 that he got his first paid TV writing job, he's been at it ever since, having authored a number of plays, TV pilots and full-length feature film scripts.

Throughout the 17 years he's been writing for the screen he has worked on such well-known shows as "Charmed," "Ellen," "Caroline in the City," "Dave's World," "Becker," "The Naked Truth," "The Tony Danza Show," "Working," "Jesse," and "Jake 2.0." He has also written two feature films, called "Party Boys" and "Family Time," and a sitcom pilot called "The Cell" that was rumored to have been picked up by Sacha Baron Cohen and adapted into a feature film. The New York Times lauds Wilding's "The Cell" as "the funniest unproduced script in Hollywood."

Perhaps what is most appealing about Wilding is his easy manner and humble attitude.

"My mom is proud," said Wilding when reflecting on his career. When asked if he ever dreamed of returning to campus to speak with and inspiring young undergraduates, he confessed that he never imagined he would have much to offer But the exceedingly warm welcome he has received so far by administrators and students in classes has proven him wrong on that count. Already the venue for his lecture has been moved to the Campus Center Auditorium, due to a high volume of anticipated attendees.

When asked about words of wisdom he might offer students, he cautions against listening to one's elders.

"Don't go looking for advice in the sense that I'm a TV writer now and most of the TV writers I know didn't start out wanting to be TV writers – as long as you find something you love to do then that sort of becomes your touchstone in a way. For me, it's writing. Even if I were to never make a penny at it I would still do it. I would still do that no matter what."

Mark Wilding will be speaking as the Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholar in Residence today at 4 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Mark Wilding graduated from U Mass in 1979 with a degree in economics. He has made a career in screen writing. His most successful endeavor is the show "Grey's Anatomy," which he produces and writes.

Extravaganja celebrates some high times

Patrons in the Amherst Common got to celebrate Extravaganja without fear of being arrested for the use or possession of marijuana on Saturday afternoon because of new legislation passed during November's election. This year marks the 18th year the event has been celebrated consecutively.

By Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano
Collegian Staff

Temperatures in the high 80s signaled the long-awaited arrival of summer and brought a large crowd to the town common for the annual Extravaganja festival on Saturday. More than 2,000 people sprawled out on the grass in downtown Amherst, soaking up the sun on the town's hottest April day in nearly 20 years. After weaving in and out of a vast labyrinth of blankets and lawn chairs, thick clouds of smoke billowing through the air, it was clear that this year's festival was more than just a pot-rally – it was a celebration.

In many ways, this year's Extravaganja was an opportunity for people to rejoice over the decriminalization of marijuana, which was adopted in Nov. 4's election and eliminates the threat of arrest for minor possession of the substance. The decriminalization was a major victory for the UMass Cannibus Reform Coalition(CRC), who have played a signifi cant role in state lobbying for the drug's legalization.

Cory Gillis, vice president of the CRC, said the festival was a way to celebrate all the hard work the organization has put in over the years to decriminalize marijuana in Massachusetts.

"It was a huge sense of satisfaction for all of us who have spent hundreds of hours tabling, petitioning and registering people to vote for the proposal," said Gillis. "I think it taught people a lot about the way the government system works."

Police cruisers idled on the streets lining the town commons, keeping an eye on the crowd. In years past, the threat of arrest was enough to deter people from smoking on the commons or even coming to the festival.

There was no such restraint on Saturday and the festival produced no legal altercations. Joints circulated freely and hand-blown smoking pipes sold by local vendors flew off the shelves. Tie-dye clothing, homemade jewelry, and shoes were also on display in neighboring tents. Fried dough, lemonade and hot dog stands served as munchies-stations, relieving cottonmouth, or dry mouth) and satiating food cravings.

The festival was emceed by Heather McCormack and Julia Sheratt of the duo Solo Sexx. The pair was among a handful of outstanding local performances. The musical lineup featured performances from Psychedelic Jazz band Primate Fiasco, local hip-hop groups The Alchemists and The Problematics, and Reggae performances from the Black Rebels.

The musical lineup was, in many ways, representative of the Amherst community. The crowd was comprised of not only students, but also their parents and professors, some of whom brought their young children to enjoy the festivities.

"I think that this year really helped represent the diversity of the people that are in this community. The diversity was definitely represented through the music," said Sheratt, a senior member of the CRC and one of the musical emcees.

In addition to the local bands that rocked the stage on Saturday, this was the second year the CRC helped put together a DJ tent, located on the opposite side of the commons. UMass students DJ Megha, DJ Badboon and WMUA radio favorite DJ Nondeskript entertained crowds on the one's and two's with a jiggy mix of electronic and hip-hop instrumentals. A scattered few danced in front of the DJ's tent with hula-hoops while others rested in the scarce shade provided by trees on the common's outskirts.

While members of the UMass CRC regard the decriminalization of marijuana as a major victory for their cause, by no means is the mission accomplished. Gillis spent his time at the festival petitioning for a bill that would legalize marijuana for medical use in the state, something that has been implemented in states like California and Colorado.

"We can't support the decriminalization bill if patients who need marijuana aren't able to receive it for medical use," said Gillis.

The CRC will continue to collect signatures to form a petition that they can send to state senators, advocating legalization for medical use. Brian Melanson, a sophomore member of the coalition, believes following the same blueprint for decriminalization is the best way to move forward.

"We know that the process works because that's how we got it decriminalized," says Melanson. "It took us five years, but we did it."

Lisa Wilson earned second place in the shot put at the UMass home meet Saturday. Her toss of 13.70 meters is a new school record.

Wilson earns second place in shot put, sets UMass record

The University of Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams both finished third last weekend to keep momentum heading into the upcoming Atlantic 10 Championships.

Junior Andrew McCann and freshman Zachary Koncki led the way for the Minutemen at the UMass Pre-Conference Meet notching the Minutemen's two first-place finishes. McCann was the only winner, finishing the 5000-meter run in 15 minutes, 12.8 seconds. Scott Koncki stood out in the field events, winning the long jump with a distance of 22 feet, 9.25 inches.

The meet also marked the return of junior Brian Miller, who had been out of action since the indoor championship season. UMass coach Ken O'Brien said Miller is one of the team's veteran leaders, and that he feels Miller's return is a major boost to the team's morale.

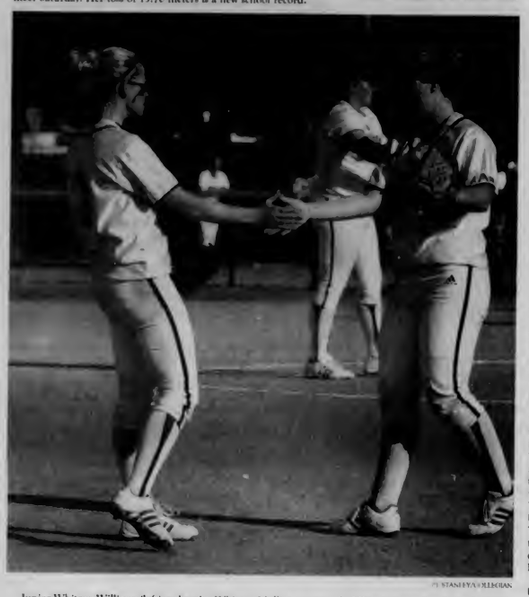
"It will give us a mentally that will help us going into next week," said O'Brien in reference to Miller's return.

Miller was one of five Minutemen who notched second-place finishes. He scored points in the high jump with a mark of 6-07.00. Sean Busch also finished second in the field events by vaulting 15-03.00. Finishing second in the track events for UMass were Ryan Diorio in the 800-meter (1:53.73), Josh Boone in the 1500-meter (3:54.60), Nicolai Naranjo in the 5000 meter run (15:38.77).

"Everybody was the [beneficiary] of nice weather," said O'Brien. "All of the teams came away with goals realized. We left in good spirits."

For the Minutewomen, junior Lisa Wilson continued her recent hot streak and was the team's top point-earner on the day. Wilson finished first in the discus (155-09) and second in the shot put (44-11.50). Her mark in the shot put set a UMass women's record breaking the one previously held by Jordan Veney.

Sophomore Ida Okkonen, junior Holly Heinricher, and the 4x400 meter relay team also came in first place for the Minutewomen. Okkonen captured first in the long jump with a distance of 18-07.25, while Heinricher won the 200-meter dash with a time of 24.71. The 4x400 relay team posted a time of 3:56.55.



Like the men's team, the women's squad also posted five second-place finishes. In the field events, Stephanie Aguguo was second best in the triple jump with a distance of 38-11.50, while Kristen Bakanowski finished the pole vault with a height of 12-03.50.

Karen Roa and Brittany Bakanowski were the top runners on the day. Roa ran the 3000-meter steeplechase in 11:24.62 and Bakanowski finished the 400-meter hurdles in 1:04.23. The 4x100 meter relay team also took second with a time of 48.68.

Dartmouth College, the University of New Hampshire, and UMass finished first, second and third in both the men's and women's divisions. On the men's side, Dartmouth tallied 177.50 points, UNH scored 139 and UMass finished with 131. In the women's division, Dartmouth amassed 187 points. UNH finished with 156 points and the Minutewomen scored 138.

The UMass track and field teams return to action this Saturday in Charlotte for the A-10 Championships. The women will begin their competition at 9 a.m., with the men starting a half-hour later.

lost to the Minutewomen in extra innings this season. UMass has beaten teams that were ranked higher than it was, but has also fallen to unranked teams earlier in the season.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino has stressed since the beginning of the year that the numbers and rankings mean very little and she said her team knows that.

"They know it doesn't mean anything," Sortino said in an interview before the season began. "They are mature; they understand that they have to do something. Who cares what we're ranked in the preseason poll? It is nice for hype and for the school, nice for our fans, but we got to do what we got to do."

There is more to today's doubleheader. UMass, who leads the all-time series while under Sortino, at 41-40-1, learned last Thursday against UConn that a rivalry can make a game closer than it is on paper. The Huskies, who traveled to Amherst on Thursday, led UMass 3-2 while UMass was down to its final out. The Minutewomen came out on top, 6-4, as a result of a seventh inning grand slam by Carly Normandin.

As far as a rivalry between UMass and Rhode Island is concerned, no team has played the Minutewomen more. The all-time series is not as close as the one with the Huskies – UMass leads URI 78-13 and 73-12 under Sortino. Nevertheless, the Rams are one of UMass' biggest rivalries

While both teams are coming off a loss against Charlotte, it may bode better for the Minutewomen. After snapping UMass' 18-game overall winning streak as well as its 49-game A-10 winning streak, the first-place Minutewomen might feel as if they have more to prove than the last-place Rams.

join existing members Fairfield, Hobart, and Loyola to form the new ECAC for the 2009-10 season. St. John's, Rutgers and Georgetown have been moved to the Big East Conference, while UMass and Penn State will go to the Colonial Athletic Association.

The move is a result of a national realignment of lacrosse leagues, driven by the new sponsorship of men's lacrosse by both the Big East Conference and the Northeast Conference.

"The lacrosse world is going through a metamorphosis and the ECAC Lacrosse League has emerged stronger than ever," Keeling said in an interview posted on the ECAC website. "The combination of the teams from the ECAC and the Great Western Lacrosse League will make us one of the power lacrosse conferences in the country."

Three of the eight teams in the newly-formed conference qualified for the NCAA Tournament last season: Denver, Loyola and Ohio State. Six of the eight teams in the new ECAC were .500 or better last season.

"Overall, we feel it is going to continue to be a highly competitive league and we are excited for 2010," Keeling added. "The game of lacrosse is growing rapidly across the nation, and we are excited to bring some of the western teams into the East and for those eastern teams to have a chance to play out West. It will only accelerate the growth of the sport across the country."

to work out," Stone said of splitting time between Gedman and Weymouth, now that Weymouth is back to baseball shape.

"Defensively, Matt's done a good job and we certainly as a team have done better when he's been our shortstop. I don't see any major changes coming in that regard."

Other welcomed news for the Minutemen is that their pitching staff is becoming more and more stable with each passing game.

Senior Mitchell Clegg has a team-leading 4-1 record in nine starts with a 4.55 ERA. Clegg last pitched in a 9-6 win over the Explorers, when he gave up six earned runs in 6 1/3 innings pitched, while striking out four and walking two. This start came shortly after his complete-game shutout of Saint Joseph's, when he struck out seven and gave up six hits.

Sophomore Nick Serino is making strides in his career as a Minuteman, pitching a complete game against St. Joe's with a two- run, four-hit, 10-strikeout performance against the Hawks. Serino didn't give up a hit to St. Joe's batters until the fourth inning.

Serino followed up that performance with a four-run, five-hit performance against La Salle. He struck out five in 6 2/3 innings.

Both Clegg and Serino have emerged as front-end pitchers for UMass, notching 53 and 52 strikeouts this season, respectively. Serino has also done a solid job of denying home runs to opposing teams this season. So far, he's given up two homers, while Clegg's given up a team-high nine.

Siena has committed 83 errors this season, nearly 20 more than opponents have committed against them.

UMass hopes to start new streak

UM looks to rebound vs. URI after first loss in 19 games

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts softball team and its opponent in a doubleheader today, Rhode Island, have one thing in common: They both lost to Charlotte last weekend.

But the similarities stop there.

A glance at the Atlantic 10 standings shows that UMass (29-7, 11-1 A-10) sits at the top – as it has been for the past few years, having built up a 49-game winning streak in conference play and an 18-game overall winning streak before losing to Charlotte on Sunday – while the Rams (13-32, 2-12 A-10) find themselves in last place.

The No. 17 Minutewomen's superiority doesn't end in the standings. As of April 20, UMass' statistics as a team were far above those of URI. The Minutewomen lead the A-10 with a .296 team batting average, a .532 team slugging percentage and a .381 on-base percentage.

The Rams rank in the bottom half of the conference at seventh in all three of those categories (.230 batting average, .297 slugging percentage, .314 on-base percentage). UMass is also tops in the conference with 45 home runs compared to Rhode Islands 11 – the eighth best in the conference.

Pitching is no different. The Minutewomen have a league-best 1.34 ERA, while the Rams have managed a mediocre one, at 3.96. The Rams also rank in the lower half of the conference with a .285 opponents' batting average, while the UMass staff holds its opposition to .173.

Their record was slightly better than that of Charlotte, who pulled off an 11-6 upset Sunday, and it was much better than that of George Washington and Boston College – two teams that have

Whitney Mollica (shown against Providence) recorded her 200th career hit against UConn last Thursday in her 200th career game. Mollica and the Minutewomen look to rebound from a surprising loss to Charlotte on Sunday with wins over Rhode Island in today's doubleheader.

Minutemen taking on Siena in non-conference matchup

Donato, Macdonald may take advantage of weak Saints' arms

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a weekend in which the Massachusetts baseball team dropped two of three games against La Salle, the Minutemen will face Siena today in non-conference action hoping to take advantage of a potential mismatch between their bats and Siena's pitching.

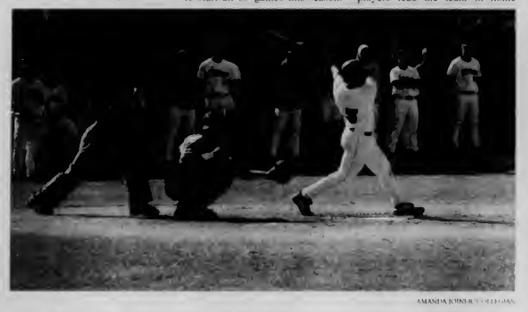
Junior outfielder Mike Donato leads UMass in batting average (.333) and is the only Minuteman to start all 35 games this season. He's hit safely in 48 plate appearances and has 27 RBIs, ranking him first and second on the team, respectively, in those categories.

Right behind Donato is junior third baseman Jim Macdonald, who boasts a .331 average this season. Macdonald has started each the 31 games he's played in this season and started every one of them, either at third base or in the designated hitter spot, giving way to senior Sam Boone. Both players lead the team in home runs, with five each.

Macdonald also has a team-leading 30 RBIs.

Donato and Macdonald look to tee-off against a Saints pitching staff that is allowing an average of 8.49 runs per game. Siena has three wins combined between its two most game-tested starters this season, Will Hassett and Craig Chaput. Both pitchers have started nine games this season.

Siena has two players who have had strong seasons. Freshman second baseman Dan Paolini leads the Saints with a .381 average, 40 RBI and is tied with outfielder Anthony Giansanti for the team lead in hits, with 61. Both have started every game for the Saints.



Siena doesn't have much firepower outside of those two. Siena is hitting .268 as a team, as opposed to UMass' .292 average.

UMass is 3-5 against the Saints (14-10) dating back to 1978.

Most of the infield positions for the Minutemen are solidified. Macdonald starts at third, Peter Copa at first and senior captain Adam Tempesta at second. The only cloudy situation is at shortstop. Junior shortstop Austin Weymouth started off the season as the everyday shortstop for UMass (15-10) but after a leg injury, sophomore Matt Gedman took the reins.

"I don't know how that's going

Crew stays sharp with win over MIT

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN

The Massachusetts rowing team followed up its biggest win of the season with a strong performance on Saturday, defeating the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in a day of head-to-head competition on the shores of the Charles River in Boston.

On the heels of capturing their 13th Atlantic 10 Championship, the Minutewomen displayed a sense of focus that left UMass assistant coach Alex Binkowski satisfied.

"Overall, I was very pleased with all the girls' performance," said Binkowski. "They are continuing to row hard. You're always preparation for the big event.

"Every time we hit the water, we look at it as a chance to improve," said Binkowski.

Saturday's race in the Charles granted the team an opportunity to be among some of the strongest rowing programs in the region. Saturday also marked the first day of the Charles River Challenge, a race that included schools such as Boston University and Northeastern.

"The Charles River has a history special to rowing in general. Binkowski said. Sometimes we feel a little hidden out here in western Massachusetts. It's a nice opportunity to race and compete with everyone around."

The Minutewomen's novice squad also gained valuable experience this weekend; though they are not ready to take on the junior varsity team yet. In what Binkowski described as the weekend performance that stood out most, the junior varsity of the Minutewomen slipped by the novice team in a race for inter-squad pride.

MIT did not have a novice team so the two teams faced off against one another. The race served as a barometer to measure how both teams stack up this late in the season.

"The novice did well. They are continuing to learn how to race." Binkowski said. "I was pleased to see the JV to step up and took charge of the race. It was a good showing."

UMass will look to take its game to another level this weekend when its heads to New Jersey to compete in the ECACs.

ECAC champion to be determined Saturday

Massachusetts can clinch title with road win over Rutgers

BY GARY TARANTINO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With one regular season game remaining, the top spot in the Eastern College Athletic Conference is still to be determined.

First-place Loyola (Md.) finished its conference schedule with a 6-1 record (9-4 overall) and will conclude its season against No. 6 Johns Hopkins on Saturday. Second-place Massachusetts one game behind the Greyhounds – finish with conference foe Rutgers on Saturday and currently hold a 5-1 conference record (8-5 overall).

ECAC Lacrosse

UMass is in control of its own destiny this weekend. A win against Rutgers will give the Minutemen the ECAC title. A victory would give both the Minutemen and the Greyhounds a 6-1 conference record, but UMass has the advantage because they beat the Greyhounds, 8-6, on March 21.

BEST OF THE REST

Fairfield has shown a big improvement from last year, ranking third in the conference standings this season. The Stags went 4-3 in the conference in 2009 after a 2-5 finish in 2008 left them in last place in the ECAC.

Georgetown, last year's second-place finisher, had a record of 5-2 in the conference and were picked to win the ECAC in pre-season rankings. Instead, the Hoyas could find themselves in fifth place with a loss against Penn State on Saturday. That game at Georgetown will determine fourth and fifth place in the conference as both teams are tied with 3-3 conference records. Penn State was 2-5 in the conference last season.

Rutgers finished in third place in '08 with a 4-3 conference record, but sits in sixth place with a 2-4 mark heading into the game against UMass. They could play the spoiler role and tarnish the hopes of the Minutemen attaining the ECAC championship.

Hobart has taken a step back this season. Last year the Statesmen were 4-3 in the conference, finishing in fourth place but this season they finished up the conference schedule with a 2-5 mark and a tie for second-to-last place.

St. John's (N.Y.) has endured another tough season. The Red Storm won two conference games last season for a sixth-place finish, but this year they won just one to finish in last place.

ECAC CHANGING

If UMass is going to win an ECAC title, it's literally now or never. Last July, ECAC Commissioner Rudy Keeling announced the addition of five members to the conference.

Air Force, Bellarmine, Denver, Ohio State and Quinnipiac will Journalism lecturer B.J. Roche interviews UMass alum Mark Wilding who is the executive producer and lead writer for "Grey's Anatomy."

Grey's Wilding addresses UM

BY CHELSEA DUGAN
DAILY COLLEGIAN

As the 30th anniversary of his college graduation approaches, Mark Wilding, the executive producer and lead writer for ABC's hit television show, "Grey's Anatomy," returned to the University of Massachusetts Campus Center auditorium on Tuesday to share his experiences and offer advice to students, faculty and other alumni, as part of the Eleanor Bateman Alumni Scholars program.

"It's extraordinarily wild to be back for the first time in 30 years," said Wilding. "UMass is remarkably the same."

Wilding was interviewed by UMass journalism lecturer B.J. Roche, who fueled the discussion with questions that were of interest to audience members in the packed auditorium.

"I was an economics major, but a very bad one. I enjoyed writing, of any sort, and pursued my passion through the Collegian. I always knew I was going to write, whether or not it was for money," he said about his time at UMass.

In his early 30s, he submitted a play entitled, "The Company Man", a comedy based on the Bhopal gas leak in India, to a playwright's festival in Santa Rosa, Calif. Shortly thereafter, Wilding was approached by Disney executives who had seen the award-winning play performed in Los Angeles, and were interested in Wilding writing scripts for television.

In his 17th year of writing for the screen, Wilding has

CONTINGENCY PLANS

For some Boston Globe staffers, The New York Times Co.'s losses come from mismanagement, and they feel that the cuts in New York have not been fair when compared with what employees in Boston have been forced to concede.

"I think The Times [Co.] has made it pretty clear that their concern is for The New York Times, not for The Boston Globe," said Globe reporter Brian C. Mooney, who has worked in the newspaper business for over 35 years and with The Globe for 21 of those years. "The Times will do what The Times has to do to save The New York Times."

Globe Photographer George Rizer said Eileen McNamara's "Times pimps, pillages Globe" column speaks for a lot of the newsroom staff, while Boston Newspaper Guild President Daniel Totten expressed similar frustrations as McNamara.

"The Times Co.'s investment in The Boston Globe has been non-existent from the beginning – The Times gladly took profits for over 16 years now, while not investing in the future of The Globe in any measurable and consistent fashion," Totten said.

But, whoever or whatever is to blame for The Globe's current economic state will not change the paper's situation.

The seven current newsroom workers interviewed said they were optimistic in The Globe enduring beyond the Times Co.'s May 1 deadline, but in what form and for how long it will last remains uncertain. On whether The Times Co. would make good on its threat to close The Globe if demands are not met by May 1, Rizer said, "You'd really have to have a real shit to say, 'Well, they didn't give in in 30 days so let's shut it down.' They would just look like total assholes."

MATT ROCHELEAU/COLLEGIAN

At Faneuil Hall in Boston the crowd clapped, chanted and cheered as 14 speakers took the stage for a "Save The Globe" rally organized by the Boston Newspaper Guild on April 24. This young girl let a sign speak for her.

Then again, "Anything is possible. No one is saying entirely that the paper shutting down is a bluff or a myth. Because, who really does know?" he said.

Globe sports columnist Dan Shaughnessy agreed.

"I have a hard time believing they would do that, but maybe I'm naive," he said. "I just think that there has got to be something I don't see how we can be erased off the face of the earth in 30 days."

There have been rumors that The Times Co. is hoping the cuts will make The Globe more appealing for a potential buyer, something Globe chief imaging technician John Ioven said he thinks will happen eventually. In the meantime, he tries not to think about it too much since he has no control over what happens in negotiations. He will just continue working like he has for the past three decades.

If deputy bureau chief Joseph Williams, who works in the Globe's Washington D.C. bureau, were to wager on it, he'd bet the paper will still be around after the 30-day deadline passes, but what The Globe will look like after May 1 and beyond is anyone's guess, he said. Conceiving of life after journalism is not something Williams finds easy, but having a contingency has crossed his mind, and he said it would be foolish if it hadn't.

"I've got a few ideas, most of which I haven't acted on yet because I'm still holding out hope that the newspaper industry will come back," he said. "I've been doing this for more than half of my life. I love this business. I love what I do and it's very difficult to give it up or see it go away."

Farah Stockman, a reporter who also works in the D.C. bureau, said she will always be a writer and will always want to writer, but she is unsure of whether or not she will be a journalist five years from now.

"I think one of the great things about journalism is it is full of people who can learn quickly and process information and go on to do lots of other really interesting things."

However versatile journalists may be, Mooney is not planning to leave the profession without a fight.

"No one's heading for the exits here, we're trying to save the paper."

Autism benefit strides to UM

Event will include 5K race, 3K walk and hopes to raise $50K

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In an effort to raise awareness and money for autism, the Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity and the Sigma Delta Tau Sorority will hold a "UWere, UAre, USpeak Autism SpeaksU 5K Race/3K Walk" outside of the Student Union on May 3.

The event includes a 5K run, a 3K walk, autism information, entertainment, auctions and raffles. Entertainment will range from face painting for kids to live bands for college students. With over 50 teams signed up, people can register individually or with a team. Each team will have a captain and a sum of money that it donates to the cause. Every participant will receive $5 worth of Burrito Bucks from Bueno Y Sano, and the top female and male runners will each receive a $100 Visa gift card.

To further promote the event, Lazer 99.3 FM and CBS 3-Springfield will be attending.

Autism is a brain development disorder that impairs social interaction. Autism disorders are diagnosed in one in 150 children in the US; however, they are more common in boys.

The diagnosis of autism has increased dramatically in past years. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has called autism a national public health crisis whose cause and cure remain unknown.

According to the Autism SpeaksU website, "Autism SpeaksU is an initiative of Autism Speaks focused on engaging youth on campuses all across the US with its ultimate goal of connecting college students with the autism community. The team at Autism SpeaksU guides students on college campuses across America through the process of organizing and coordinating fundraising events on their campus to benefit the Autism Speaks Foundation."

The idea for the event first began at Penn State University with a walk called Autism Speaks, which raised more than $91,000 in the first year and over $550,000 over the past four years.

Penn State then began an initiative to spread the philanthropy to other universities, such as the University of Connecticut, Maryland University and the University of Massachusetts with a subsequent event called Autism SpeaksU.

"Not only are UMass students getting involved, but the surrounding community of Amherst is as well. Although our main objective is to raise our goal of $50,000, we are also trying to raise awareness," said UMass Autism Speaks Chairman, Jason Grass. "There will be schools coming out, and we hope that children will be able to come together and share this special event with one another. I believe that this event will be a great opportunity for autistic children to share this special moment with each other."

"So far, we have about 250 people signed up and we hope that this number increases within the next week," he added. "Currently, it is $20 to register and you get a free T-shirt when you sign up."

The walk is expected to be the biggest fundraiser on campus, and so far, more than $15,000 have been raised. One can sign up and get more information at Autismspeaks.org/u/umass.

General course site launched

Last week marked site's debut

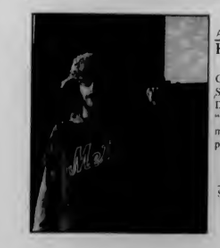
MATT SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"Why did they make me sign up for human nature 100 and college writing? I'm in SOM; I don't need to learn to write!"

Topics of conversation like this have become common as class registration rolls around every April. For half a century, there has been a major debate in higher education over whether introductory courses are relevant to students' respective job prospects. Some students feel those credits could be used towards more specialized, hands-on preparation courses.



In an effort to inform students about general education courses, the General Education Task Force developed a new website emphasizing the value and importance of a general education. The new website, which made its debut last week, details requirements for students while explaining the objectives of the University of Massachusetts curriculum.

Their objective is to help students understand how general education courses will broaden their understanding across all disciplines, while enhancing their abilities to think critically and make informed judgments. The goal of the task force is to ultimately make students see the requirements as part of the college experience.

Along with the objectives listed on the website are sections in the history of general education, lists of courses and a planning guide for students. The site contains resources for academic advisors and administrators as well.

Another intention of the newly developed site is to inform parents of the education requirements. This section contains frequently asked questions aimed at debunking the myths surrounding general education.

CDC: U.S. swine flu fatalities anticipated

BY TONY PUGH AND WILLIAM DOUGLAS
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — As the number of confirmed U.S. swine flu cases jumped from 45 to 64 on Tuesday, a federal health official said it's only a matter of time before the highly contagious disease claims its first American fatality.

"As we continue to investigate cases here, I expect that we will see deaths in this country," said Richard Besser, the acting director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), during a press conference on Tuesday.

Besser's prediction reflects the growing threat posed by the mysterious swine flu virus and the inability of health officials both here and abroad to contain its spread.

"No single action that somebody takes, whether it be the government, a community, a family or an individual, will halt this. But the combined actions that we all take together will reduce the impact on our communities and on our health," Besser said.

Anne Schuchat, the CDC's interim deputy director for science and public health programs, echoed Besser's concerns during testimony before a Senate Appropriations subcommittee on Tuesday.

"Based on the pattern of illness that we're seeing here in the United States, we don't think that this virus can be contained, that we can stop it at the border. But we do think we can reduce the impact of its spread and we can reduce the impact on health" by focusing on "community mitigation" efforts, Schuchat said.

These can include taking extra precautions such as stepped-up hand washing and increased diagnostic screening or simply avoiding sick people and keeping ill adults and children home from work and school to avoid further disease transmission.

To assist in these efforts, President Barack Obama asked Congress on Tuesday to add $1.5 billion to his 2009 supplemental budget request to help fight the swine flu outbreak.

In a letter to Congress, Obama said the money could be used to help boost stockpiles of antiviral medications, develop a swine flu vaccine or assist international efforts to stem the outbreak.

It remains unclear why the disease hasn't hit as severely outside Mexico, where roughly 150 people have died and more than 1,300 have been infected.

Besser said authorities are looking at a number of factors, including whether the virus has changed, what differs about the environment where the infections occurred, how the immune systems of infected patients reacted as well as the ages and gender of those afflicted. In addition, health officials are evaluating initial medical treatment, how much time lapsed before the victims sought medical care and whether they received antiviral medications.

The World Health Organization reported that seven countries have confirmed cases of swine flu, and officials in Israel, New Zealand, Spain and Canada announced new infections on Tuesday as the virus continues to migrate across Europe and parts of the Middle East.

Of the 19 new U.S. cases confirmed Tuesday, 17 were in the same New York City high school where dozens of students were infected during a recent trip to Mexico for spring break.

The CDC recommends that schools close as a precaution if a swine flu case is confirmed. At least two schools, one in New York and one in Texas, have closed due to the virus, Besser said.

A medical worker carries samples from people with flu-like symptoms.

Nationally, 45 cases have been confirmed in New York, 10 in California, six in Texas, two in Kansas and one in Ohio. The CDC warns their totals may lag behind the individual state figures, which are more up-to-date.

Five U.S. patients, ranging in age from 7 to 54, have been hospitalized, Besser said. Three are in California, while two are in Texas.

The CDC has deployed personnel to both states to work with state and local health authorities.

A Gallup Poll found that more than 12 million Americans are ill with more common strains of the flu on any given day, and the CDC estimates that foodborne illnesses kill 5,000 Americans each year.

Senator Specter switches from GOP to Dems

BY STEVEN THOMMA
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — Just over four years ago, a triumphant Republican Party re-elected a president, controlled both houses of Congress and reveled in its prospects for the future.

That was then. Now, as Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania switches to become a Democrat, the Republican Party is in shambles.

It doesn't have a single member of the House of Representatives from New England. It's losing ground in the Mountain West. It's fighting to defend its base in the South.

With Specter's defection, it's all but lost the ability to filibuster legislation in the Senate – it will lose it if Democrat Al Franken is seated from Minnesota, as expected – and with it the power to command attention or influence the national agenda.

It is, for the moment at least, what Zell Miller, the former Georgia governor and senator, said so derisively of his fellow Democrats just a few years back: a national party no more.

"Anyone who tells you the Republican Party is on its way back is smoking grass," said GOP strategist Frank Luntz. "For the party to win, it has to have a broad base. They've lost the broad base."

Republicans are losing ground in a fast-changing America where women, minorities and the young make up bigger and bigger slices of the electorate, and they all tend to vote Democratic.

"The changing demography is not on the side of the Republican Party," said Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway. "Republicans seem to be waiting for the single to get married and the young to get old."

One reason why Democrats made inroads into the Republican South in last year's presidential election by taking Virginia and North Carolina is the rapid growth of the Hispanic vote there, she said.

Another problem is the Asian-American vote, which went solidly Republican a generation ago but went 2-1 for Barack Obama in 2008.

It wasn't just the choice between Obama and Republican John McCain – the Republican brand itself is suffering.

After the 2001 terrorist attacks, the ranks of Americans who identified with the Republican Party pulled even with those calling themselves Democrats. It was a rare moment of political parity for a Republican Party that's historically trailed the Democrats since Franklin D. Roosevelt built the modern Democratic coalition in the 1930s.

Disenchantment among Republicans over high spending in Bush's second term drove many away. While the number of voters calling themselves Democrats remained stable at about 33 percent, the number calling themselves Republicans dropped sharply, to 22 percent in a recent survey by the independent Pew Research Center.

Also, if governing put pressure on the party to maintain a majority in Congress for the first six years that George W. Bush was president, the GOP's losses of Congress in 2006 and the White House in 2008 have increased the natural tendency of factions to blame one another.

Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter switched political parties yesterday.

For Republicans, that's meant an active conservative base working to purge the party of people such as Specter, who often break ranks, even if purging them means the party slips further from power. They call Specter-style centrists RINOs, or Republicans in Name Only.

Specter noted that 200,000 Republicans left his state's party last year to become Democrats, leaving a smaller state party that's more dominated by conservatives and more likely to reject him in next year's primary.

"Don't let the door hit you on the way out," said conservative columnist Michelle Malkin.

Yet it's unlikely that the Republican Party can fight its way back to power with conservatives alone. Specter's switch reduces their ranks to 40 in the Senate, assuming that Franken is awarded Minnesota's vacant seat, as one state court already has ruled. That decision is next before the state Supreme Court.

Forty votes aren't enough to tie up the Senate and block the Democrats' agenda with filibusters. Republicans need at least 41 votes to do that.

"The GOP desperately needed the next 18 months to put forward a vision that wasn't based on the Bush presidency. And they need the Senate as their staging ground," Luntz said.

"With 41 votes, they had the ability to hold up some legislation and be relevant, to put forward an alternative point of view and force the media to pay attention. At 40 votes, they've lost that platform. They cease to be relevant."
At least for now.

The last time the Republicans slipped to 40 or fewer seats in the Senate was after the 1976 election, when Democrat Jimmy Carter took the White House and the Democrats trounced the Republicans in the first election after the Watergate scandal.

Four years later? Republican Ronald Reagan took the White House, his party took the Senate, and a conservative revolution reshaped American politics.

Faneuil Hall to listen to 14 speakers, including Mooney.

The crowd gathered for the noontime affair was a mix of reporters, editors, their family members, readers young and old, city union workers, media covering the rally and local politicians. Signs, which read "The Globe belongs to Boston," "Preserve free speech," "Support Globe workers" and "Save the Boston Globe" were distributed to the audience, many of whom adorned stickers advertising the newly-created SaveTheBostonGlobe.com.

Globe reporter Bella English's speech talked about how event organizers had some trouble getting more newsroom people than were in attendance to come; not because they were worried about their jobs and not because they didn't care, but because they were working on deadlines.

English had two stories of her own to complete after the rally.

"UNTIL THE LAST BELL IS RUNG"

Two weeks earlier while stuck at a traffic light, Rizer said aloud, as if directed towards an imaginary person who could turn the light green and speed up traffic, "gotta go, gotta go, gotta go."

Rizer repeated the phrase several times throughout the day – while waiting in line at a MassPike toll booth on his way to a photo assignment at Harvard, and waiting at 7 a.m. for the Globe headquarters' slow-moving elevator to bring him to the third-floor cafeteria for an omelet and home fries.

His attitude was more curious than impatient.

If he does go into teaching after he leaves The Globe, Rizer is not sure if he'll be able to deal with the structure and monotony of working in a classroom five days a week. Rizer said he just likes to know what's going on in the world around him, to be informed and to stay busy. It's why he was on his sixth-straight day at The Globe. It's why he stood on the hood of his Buick to get a higher angle for a photo of students from Boston College High School as they processed to several different churches as part of a Good Friday ritual. It's why he has taken the time to learn about the new technology in journalism, including how to shoot and edit video. And, it's why he does not plan to shut off his police scanners even after he leaves The Globe.

For Ioven, it's why he "plan[s] on working here until the last bell is rung."

As Williams put it, "people don't get into journalism to make money and they don't get into journalism to have nice careers or to be stars. You get into it for the work. You get into it because this is what you want to do. You get into it because you'd do it for free."

Mooney echoed that sentiment.

"This is all I've ever really wanted to do," he said. "I'm from this area, and working at The Globe was my idea of the best job I could have."

He added, "I'm sort of prepared to go down with the ship if it comes to it."

A call for dialogue

Ben Moriarty

Miss California is a dumb bitch. Well, according to Perez Hilton at least. And probably most people who disagree with her answer.

At this year's Miss USA pageant – yes, this is extremely important in all of our lives – Carrie Prejean, the representative from California, was asked, "Vermont recently legalized same-sex marriages, do you think other states should follow suit, why or why not?"

This was, of course, asked by none other than Perez Hilton. If you don't know who he is, you must not be an 18-year-old girl.

Judging from the fact that she was called a dumb bitch by a gay man, you can tell what her answer was. She said that she believed marriage should be between a man and a woman.

To put her whole quote in perspective, Prejean said, "We live in a land where you can choose same-sex marriage or opposite. And you know what, I think in my country, in my family, I think that I believe that a marriage should be between a man and a woman. No offense to anybody out there, but that's how I was raised."

Hilton, in a video blog he posted right after the ceremony, said that Prejean was a dumb bitch not because she disagrees with same-sex marriage, but because she didn't give an in-depth analytical view about states' rights and federal rights.

But then, to put the icing on the cake, he followed that up by saying, "She gave an awful, awful answer which offended so many people. And Miss California, Miss USA doesn't alienate, but she unites and inspires."

The question wasn't about whether she would give an answer which talked about the judicial processes that should be undergone in the process of legalizing same-sex marriage. The question was, considering it was from a very popular gay blogger on celebrities, about whether she thought other states should be enlightened and legalize gay marriage. She then said, politely, after saying that there was a choice in our country (to perhaps even signify that states had the right to choose), no.

Whoop-de-doo. She said no, like over half the country would.

If she had said yes, saying absolutely nothing about states' rights, do you think Hilton would have called her a dumb bitch? So, obviously not. The nutjob fundamentalist (perfect) would have been mad, since she most likely would have seen it the hadn't said no. But that just proves my point.

If both sides believe there is an absolute truth, but don't agree on it and don't try to test their beliefs, it just shows they really don't care all that much.

There is a major problem in our country: everyone everywhere thinks they are so damn smarter than everyone else. If you don't agree with gay marriage, you are a hateful, ignorant bigot. If you disagree with abortion, you are an ignorant misogynist. If you disagree with taxing the wealthy, you are an ignorant bleeding heart liberal or a communist. If you are for the war, or support the troops, you are a murderer enabler.

We even see it on our own campus. Prime example, nevermind, examples: anything to do with the UMass Republican Club.

They may be trolls, bringing people in to talk about controversial things like how hate crimes aren't really hate crimes, holding anti-rallies about nothing and complaining about sexual pictures in the Student Union. But all that happens is the (useless) Radical Student Union sometimes wakes up enough organization to sometimes complain or rally against them and people around campus just say how silly they are.

Quite possibly, that could be very well true. But it shows how such polarizing stances do, nothing to further any discussion. If both sides believe there is an absolute truth, but don't agree on it and don't try to test their beliefs, it just shows they really don't care all that much.

Writing someone an ignorant moron isn't going to get them to agree with you. Thinking you know everything and that someone who disagrees with you is just a dumb bitch is full embarrassment.

Gov. Deval Patrick, the newly elected president of the Republican Club, said in an e-mail I received, and I imagine most received as well since I don't know how he got my e-mail address, "It takes an intelligent person to know both sides of the story whether you agree with it or not. I think it is an important aspect for students to be able to have a wide range of diverse opinions which will enable them to come to conclusions on their own with all the opinions."

Sometimes, it's more than whether you think someone is dumb or not because you have strong feelings on an issue. Proper dialogue is necessary; and getting to the point where you're willing to call someone a dumb bitch or an ignorant twit shows you are past the point of reasonable dialogue. If this is the case, you are most likely past the point of reason and are going to end up old and snickering to yourself when you make online comments towards kids 40 years your junior.

And sometimes, it's just fun to make fun of both sides of the spectrum, even though you commit your worldview to beliefs to a pseudo-liberation theology.

Patriots' Day more than 4-20

Andrew Prowten

As we all know, there were no classes last Monday. Many of my friends and fellow students were thrilled because it was 4/20, the counterculture holiday for cannabis.

But, what surprisingly few people I've talked to know, is that we didn't have school because it was Patriots' Day. Patriots' Day has nothing to do with football, nor is it a national holiday. In fact, Patriots' Day is only celebrated in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the state of Maine and is a "public school observance day" in Wisconsin (whatever that means).

The past several years, I have spent my Patriots' Day with my family, watching members of the historical society shoot off muskets and canons after "Paul Revere" rides through town (with a police escort), warning us that the British are coming. It isn't big – it's actually kind of goofy – and not many people care about it, but it is a very important holiday.

Patriots' Day commemorates the brave men who fought the British in my hometown of Concord, Mass., and neighboring Lexington, Mass. It is also to honor the servicemen and women who have fought and died for our great nation throughout history.

Let me put it out there. I'm not some right-wing nut, I don't like war and I've inhaled more than once. But the showing of "Half Baked" for the Central Residential Area's Patriots' Day bash last weekend was an insult to the friends my brother lost in Balad, Iraq.

As Americans, we cannot forget who we are. We are the nation that created democracy as we know it. We are the nation that helped destroy evil men like Adolf Hitler and Saddam Hussein. And we are the nation that millions have flocked to for salvation from famine, persecution and poverty.

We have our skeletons; there is no question about that. But millions of brave Americans – several of them in my family – proudly gave their lives simply because we asked them to. Why, then, have we forgotten them? When did dope become more important than the men and women who have literally died for our rights to protest and vote for Question 2? Can't we give the wounded Patriots just one day of the year?

When did dope become more important than the men and women who have literally died for our rights to protest and vote for Question 2?

I am disgusted with the apathy of my peers. I smoke pot from time to time, but I still care about the world around me and the country that treats me well. I have friends who didn't vote last November because neither candidate supported so-called "important issues" such as the legalization of marijuana.

Have we forgotten how privileged we are as Americans? I hear countless people around me complaining about how oppressed they are. Sure, I'm one of them. I hate cops, am in debt and can't afford my car insurance anymore. But I am still aware of and appreciate the privileges I enjoy as an American.

I can walk down the street without worrying about being killed for my religion, I can hold my representatives accountable through voting and protest and I can call the president an idiot without being executed. I can do all of this because of the sacrifice American freedom fighters have made. It is the ignorant actions of those around me that discredit these privileges and make me lose faith in the future of the United States.

All around me, I see students who are too stoned to do their work, too wasted to wake up for class and too high to care. What really scares me is that we college students are supposed to be the elite. I want everyone reading this to ask yourself if you really deserve to be called an American. Ask yourself if you truly understand and appreciate the sacrifice that many of our grandparents made 60 years ago.

Even if you don't support the idea of war, you cannot deny the sacrifice of the soldier. Maybe we have no right to wage war in other countries. But it is not the patriots who choose to do so – it is the American people, us, who send them there.

I want my readers to think hard about how they got to where they are today. Without patriots like my brother, we wouldn't be at a public university. Without patriots like my brother, we wouldn't be able to participate in government. Without patriots like my brother, we wouldn't be able to have smoked excessive amounts of pot last Monday.

So last Patriots' Day, instead of laughing at Bob Saget asking Dave Chappelle if he has ever falated another man for pot, I called my brother and thanked him for the service and sacrifice he has made for the United States.

Integrated, not yet equal in race relations

Ben Rudnick

The many racial controversies of the past year have got me thinking about where our society stands on these issues. My interest has been intensified by several discussions in my Bill of Rights class, especially those regarding the interaction between race, society and the law.

From the confrontational days of the long presidential campaign, particularly the controversy surrounding Reverend Jeremiah Wright, to the joy surrounding Obama's election, to the burning of a black church in Springfield just hours later, it has been a dramatic time. Not to mention the Jason Vassell case, that has highlighted racial controversy on campus and in the local community.

While there has certainly been a lot of tension around here, other areas of the country don't seem so deeply divided. This begs the larger question: Did Obama's victory signal the end of institutionalized racism in America?

I do not mean the phenomenon of racism, since there will always be individuals whose phobias regarding the "other" manifest as bigotry and irrational hatred for those who are different. Rather, does our society now accept that individuals of all ethnicities are fundamentally equal, and that we should embrace "colorblind" social policy and legal forms?

I think the majority finds this to be true, feeling that Obama's rise begins a post-racial narrative in our society. There are also strong currents of dissent from this dominant view, though I do not believe that those in opposition demographically match our ethnic and political makeup, and many contend it is fallacious to declare an end to racial division simply because we have an African-American president. However, it seems the dominant view is that our societal framework has rejected the concept of inequality based solely on race.

To be sure, this is clearly what people want to believe, and that narrative of equality was on display on Inauguration Day. In contrast to the hypersensitive atmosphere of the campaign, and despite the somewhat discordant note struck by Reverend Joseph Lowery's playful but racially worded rhyming benediction, the theme of the day was clearly one of ethnic integration. But was the presentation a reflection of a new reality, or was it contrived by the media to support their desire for racial unity?

Does our society now accept that individuals of all ethnicities are fundamentally equal, and that we should embrace 'colorblind' social policy and legal forms?

It would be much easier if these questions were merely academic. However, developments in both the legal and social scientific realms indicate that post-racist beliefs are already being translated into policy by the Supreme Court, and both sides in the debate are enlisting sociologists to support their views.

For example, in recent rulings on the use of racial categories for public school enrollment in Seattle, WA and Louisville, KY, the Supreme Court found it unconstitutional to rely solely on ethnicity in determining the diversity of educational institutions. Chief Justice Roberts' opinion reflected a clearly post-racialist view when he wrote, "The way to stop discrimination on the basis of race is to stop discriminating on the basis of race."

Justice Breyer opposed this point of view, and invoked the specter of resegregation in his dissenting opinion. But briefs by many education scientists were presented in support of both sides in the "Parents Involved" cases. Justice Thomas remarked on the scholars' disagreements in his concurring opinion opposing the racial categorizations. He concluded, in part, that the "tenuous relationship between forced racial mixing and improved educational results for black children" rendered the state's compelling interest in using race as its sole measure of diversity insupportable.

For years, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) challenged "separate but equal" and Jim Crow laws by fighting for functionally equal facilities, especially schools, for blacks and whites. In Brown v. Board of Education, the court recognized that the "separate" part of the equation was in itself unequal and declared segregation unconstitutional. Yet somehow, despite the best of intentions, the growing body of law in support of structural equality was cast aside in the pursuit of the new doctrine of integration.

As the incidents with comedian Michael Richards and radio host Don Imus suggest, no matter how diligently we try as a nation to stamp out bigotry, it will always defy our efforts, emerging at the most unpredictable of times, and from sources we may never have suspected.

Maybe the best we can do is to be ever watchful for racism which seems to derive from ignorance, and treat those instances as "teachable moments." In contrast, the wider issue of how we address society's inequalities is not even that easy to address.

Perhaps in those matters, the best we can hope to do is to continue the debate, to never settle for any status quo, satisfactory or not and remain always mindful that issues of equality are far less susceptible to legal remedy than we once believed.

Yet many reject the post-racialist view of Chief Justice Roberts, Justice Thomas and social scientists like Abigail Thernstrom, citing the economic inequality of blacks in American society. Referring to the statistically lower academic achievement of students in inner-city areas, where there are a far greater proportion of black students, or the tragically higher poverty rates among African Americans, there are many who contend that any society that fails to address these issues will never attain real "colorblindness." They argue that, despite all our efforts to achieve equality under the law, these structural imbalances must be solved for true equality to prevail.

It is fascinating to note the similarity between modern arguments over the unequal results achieved by America's current public education system and those of a time when segregation was acceptable while inequality itself was legally prohibited. Before the landmark Brown v. Board of Education decision in 1954, the law of the land was the "separate but equal" doctrine established by the Plessy v. Ferguson case in 1896.

Torture tarnishes American pride

Matt Kushi

Former President George W. Bush has been out of office for over two months now, and his name is still flying around the news networks. The issue that he is finding himself at the center of is torture.

Yes, the United States tortured prisoners of war during the Bush administration. There are probably many other cases of torture that history does not know of yet. However, the focus is in the present – a time when we need to be progressing.

The issue here isn't if it happened. Rather, the issue is why did it happen? As more and more records from the Bush administration are released, it is becoming clear that this was not a passing matter. We listened as Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney told us that we did not torture in the United States. For many, it seemed like a lie from good ol' George and Tricky Dick II.

Later, Cheney would defiantly voice his opinion that waterboarding, one of the methods of torture, was acceptable. Now he claims we got vital information from the use of torture. We've got to ask ourselves the question – should we trust a sneering former vice president?

The truth about this argument is that the United States did wrong. Not only did we torture, but higher-up officials knew about it as well. Our government lied to the American public about how involved we were in torture because they knew it was unethical.

In 1949, nations from all over the world attended the Geneva Convention in Geneva, Switzerland, for their third meeting to negotiate international treaties. In this meeting, a matter of discussion was the treatment of prisoners of war. Articles 13 through 16 cover these conditions of treatment.

One line from Article 13 reads, "Prisoners of war must at all times be humanely treated. Any unlawful act or omission by the Detaining Power causing death or seriously endangering the health of a prisoner of war in its custody is prohibited, and will be regarded as a serious breach of the present Convention. In particular, no prisoner of war may be subjected to physical mutilation or to medical or scientific experiments of any kind which are not justified by the medical, dental or hospital treatment of the prisoner concerned and carried out in his interest."

The language is very clear here that prisoners of war are not to be endangered or harmed in any manner. However, we seemed to have intentionally tried to bypass this.

An eye for an eye does not work in international policy. The fact that we would resort to torturing as al-Qaeda did only showed strength on the al-Qaeda side.

Some arguments that can be made for the use of torture is that one of our enemies, Al-Qaeda, did not operate according to the Geneva Convention. Maybe not. But that still does not give us permission to break the laws that we have helped to enact just to get back at an enemy.

An eye for an eye does not work in international policy. The fact that we would resort to torturing as al-Qaeda did only showed strength on the al-Qaeda side. It shows that they instilled enough anger and fear within us to lower ourselves to their unethical torturing methods. Also, this would give enemies a justified reason to torture Americans.

Others argue that a president has the ultimate decision of how to interrogate. This is sometimes referred to as the "Nuremberg Defense," according to Commondreams.org.

One can't go combing the Constitution for implied meanings to engage in an act that is already deemed unethical by a code of conduct. Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson had many arguments as to whether a National Bank was legal because it was not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution. And now we find that our government was looking for an implied meaning to condone torture?

We got this whole mess correct with the Geneva Conventions. Why would a country that has gradually listened to its moral sense want to engage in inhumane acts against others? What would we gain from simulating drowning someone? Or playing Russian Roulette with someone? Or subjecting someone to conditions that no human should have to ever endure?

The answer is nothing. How pure are those confessions that we have received? When you were little, you probably stole cookies from the cookie jar. When caught and threatened with grounding, you lied to your mother about the incident. If you lied to your own mother about a small incident, why would you tell the truth about a big incident to someone that would not mind seeing you dead? Especially if any form of a confession, true or false, could stop the pain?

In the end, the United States was wrong on its use of torture in the earlier part of this decade. Now that this issue is out, it is time that we see it and learn from it. We must learn that, as great a country that we are, the United States is not above the law.

'Merry Wives' Shakespeare's underated gem

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

Shakespeare's "The Merry Wives of Windsor" is a little-produced play, often falling by the wayside in favor or his more well-known comedies like "Much Ado About Nothing," "The Winter's Tale" or "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The performance of "Merry Wives," put on by the Renaissance Center Theater Company this Sunday, was so well done that one wondered why the play is not more popular.

The set within the Renaissance Center's Black Box Theater was sparse, with only a table, some chairs and a bench on the floor, and a few wooden painted tree tufts and dangling ivy attached to the walls. Such a minimalist set is true to Shakespearean-era productions and helped to make certain scenes within the show more comical.

When Mistress Page (Emily List) had to quickly hide from Falstaff, List dramatically pressed herself up against one of the walls and pulled her veil in front of her face since the set truly offered nowhere else to hide. List's wide shifting eyes – the only part of her face left visible – were absurdly funny as she stood there incognito.

Similarly, the scant set furthered the comedic element during Ford's (Ruaidri Johnson) impassioned search for Falstaff in his wife's chamber. After Falstaff was rolled off stage hidden in the laundry basket, Johnson slammed open the stool and bench – the only hiding places other than a curtained-off closet. Yet even without Falstaff's portly belly, it would have been impossible for him to fit in the cramped bench or under the stool, making Ford's search especially ridiculous.

Casting for "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was skillfully done, as each actor seemed suited just to his role and would have seemed out of place in any other.

Caroline Correia's loud brashness as the Hostess of the Garter was fitting, as was her swaggering step. Joey Stankewiwicz captured the dreamy foolishness of Slender, and Gregory Kleciak's jovial tone and look was well matched to the trusting husband, Page.

The Renaissance Center Theater Company stayed true to the play, as Jack Zarycky and Walter Carroll spoke with accents as the Welsh priest Sir Hugh Evans and the French doctor Caius, respectively.

While a true Welshman or Frenchman would certainly know the accents were fake, both Zarycky and Carroll demonstrated careful work with their lines to sound as authentic as possible. Both spoke impressively and maintained their accented speech throughout the performance.

The pacing in certain scenes could have been improved. A few minutes into the play Shallow, Slender, Sir Hugh Evans, Page, Falstaff, Pistol and Nym are all onstage at once. Not only did this make for a crowded stage in the tiny black box theater, but with the quickness of the actors' speech it made for a confusing stage. This scene and that of the fight between the doctor and the priest should have been slowed so the audience could keep pace.

This issue was almost nullified by the skillful acting, however. It is difficult to say that any one actor shone among the others because all demonstrated talent and experience.

Brittany Fitzgibbon was strong as the devising Mistress Quickly, with her sidelong glances at the various men she schemed with.

Brooke Steinhauser and List made wonderful "Merry Wives" – List's facial expressions as Mistress Page were hilarious, as she looked sly, cunning and mischievously delighted in turn. Steinhauser genuinely seemed to be holding back mirth with a light smile when she – as Mistress Ford – duped her husband and Falstaff time and again.

Even those with less experience showed talent. For even after a 40-year hiatus from stage, Steve Kallaugher captured both the sack-drinking, pleased-with-himself Falstaff and the miserable, thrice-duped Falstaff well.

Nothing was overacted – except what should have been. List's and Steinhauser's acting-within-acting was expertly done. Their exaggerated movements, slightly stiff speech and overtly loud speech were perfectly silly and had the audience in stitches.

The Renaissance Center Theater Company did justice to an often-overlooked play. One might hope that seeing such a high caliber performance may encourage others to take on "The Merry Wives of Windsor" more often.

'Czech Dream' a hoax Flavin Auditorium shows provocumentary

By Caroline Scannell
Collegian Staff

"It will be a nice big bash/And if you got no cash/Get a loan and scream/I want to fulfill my dream" goes the jingle for "Czech Dream," the fictitious hyper-market, after which the film "Czech Dream" is named.

The film, touted by the "Economist" as "the funniest European film of the year," will be screened on Wednesday night as part of the Massachusetts Multicultural Film Festival celebrating the 20-year anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Produced by two Czech film students, Filip Remunda and Vit Klusak, the "provocumentary," as described by the filmmakers, chronicles the hype surrounding the opening of a new big-box superstore in a Prague suburb. Though the store itself doesn't actually exist, the directors spend millions of dollars on marketing and promotions to draw shoppers to a ribbon-cutting ceremony where they watch and film what happens.

Following the 1989 fall of communism in the Czech Republic, the country saw a huge influx of foreign capital, jump-starting the development of Wal-Mart-styled superstores. Just in the past five years, 125 such mega-markets have been erected across the country.

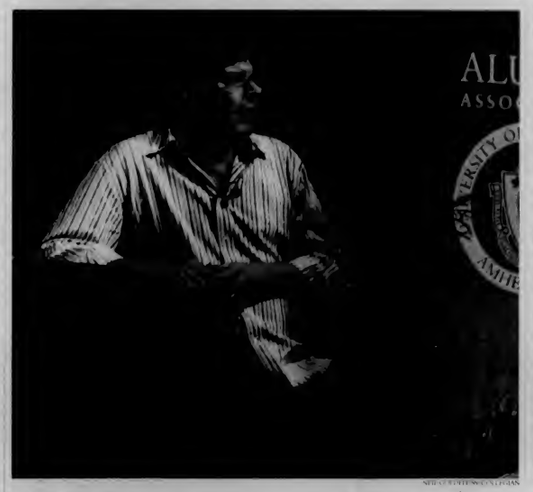
This kind of super-charged development and the capitalist propaganda that accompanied it prompted the filmmakers to provide a commentary on the changing social atmosphere as Czechs negotiate the dual forces of capitalism and globalization in a formerly communist country.

In the film, the grand opening draws crowds of thousands, all searching for rock-bottom prices and seduced by the possibility of finding everything their hearts desire under one (nonexistent) roof. The throngs of people arrive, only to find 11 film crews and a canvas store façade stretched across construction scaffolding.

As the hoax comes to light, the film raises the question of blame as it implicates advertisers and politicians as producers of capitalist propaganda and manipulators of public opinion. "We used the strength of advertising so that its weight was used against its bearer," explain the filmmakers in an interview.

Additionally, the film similarly blames shoppers for believing the scam, prompting the disappointed shoppers to laugh at themselves and examine the propaganda to which they have fallen prey. In this sense, the film draws on the country's rich national history, picking at a still sore scab.

"We grew up in an advertisement-free country, with Communist propaganda all over the place. And then it turned the other way around." Commercial propaganda has now taken the place of state propaganda, but citizens and consumers continue to be duped time and time again.



For a number of reasons, the young filmmakers manage to communicate such a "cheeky treatise on capitalism" due to the dual perspective with which they view contemporary society. Having witnessed the onslaught of capitalism once the Eastern Bloc opened up to the West, Czechs of this age group don't view consumer culture with the well adjusted eyes of the Western world.

By the same token, having been spared the darkest days of communist control, the filmmakers do not echo the unilateral, pro-capitalist views of older generations of Czechs. Festival curator Catherine Portuges explains, "Some young people have the privilege of being annoyed with the capitalist system, as maybe people all over the world are. There is a generational divide because there are those who lived through the more repressive and very traumatic part of [communism] that still feel that with all its failings and all its obvious problems, [capitalism] is better than what they had before."

The film and the festival at large seek to explore the pros and cons of communism versus capitalism, with both relief and nostalgia. Portuges explains, "We thought 'Czech Dream' would be a good example of how a certain shift in mentality occurred, from a state-supported socialist system to what was, at the very beginning, a kind of wild capitalism that didn't really know exactly where things were going."

"Czech Dream" will be screened Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. in the Flavin Auditorium as part of the 16th annual Massachusetts Multicultural Film Festival.

Grey's writer speaks at UM

worked on well-known shows such as "Charmed," "Ellen," "Caroline in the City," "Dave's World," "Becker," "The Naked Truth," "The Tony Danza Show," "Working," "Jesse" and "Jake 2.0". He has also written two feature films, "Party Boys" and "Family Time," as well as a sitcom pilot titled "The Cell", which The New York Times has acclaimed, "the funniest unproduced script in Hollywood."

Wilding openly discussed the process, strategy and skill involved in maintaining a life and career as a professional writer. "It's important to keep reinventing yourself along the way," said Wilding. "Always be on the look out for new stories and inspiration, take a fresh angle on whatever you come across."

Audience members were enthralled by Wilding's discussion of the creative process of writing for "Grey's Anatomy." Wilding described the show's secret writer's room as, "the most politically incorrect environment I've ever encountered." The room, which Wilding depicted as a sacred space surrounded by numerous white boards that map out the plot of the show's myriad of characters, relationships and dramas, is the breeding ground for the show's award-winning episodes.

"We have a great array of writer's on board. There are 11 of us, each with our own strong opinions," said Wilding. "We even have one hypochondriac, and so we are hardly ever at a loss for ideas."

One episode of "Grey's Anatomy" is assigned to one writer in particular. After consulting with the other writers, the actors, network executives and even professional surgeons, an episode takes between nine and ten days to shoot. "We end up having to cut about 12 minutes of the show at the end of each episode, based on commercial time," said Wilding, "I'd much prefer to air the 55 minute version of the shows we write so that the audiences didn't have to miss out on great acting – and even better writing!" Wilding's light-hearted joke earned laughs throughout the audience.

In his four years of working on "Grey's Anatomy," Wilding has been named the 2007 Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation award winner for the episode, "Where the Boys Are." Wilding discussed the backlash the show received from viewers after a lesbian character, Erica Hahn, left the show for contractual and scripting reasons. "The character, Erica Hahn, was not dismissed from the show because she was a lesbian, but I could see why some viewers may take it that way," said Wilding. "It's important to take creative risks for the good of the show; whether the viewers like it or not, it's important to do different things."

Before taking numerous questions from audience members, Wilding was presented with a clock ornamented with a plaque by Chancellor Robert C. Holub, in recognition of his achievements.

In addressing the question of one alumnus who asked if he would read her material, Wilding generously promised any individual with hopes of being discovered as a writer in Hollywood, that he would read the first 30 pages of any script, and depending on what he thought, may pass it on to agents or directors.

"I know what it's like to have high hopes of landing your work in the right hands," said Wilding. "I will give anyone a 30-page shot, because that's what I always hoped for."

Wilding ended his discussion with a parting piece of advice. "If you're serious about a future in acting or writing, go to Hollywood and do everything you can there to break-in," said Wilding. "Write something people can't ignore, and write with a passion."

Devine's most diverse album

Kevin Devine released his latest album, "Brother's Blood" on Tuesday. It is his most diversified and mature project to date.

'Brother's Blood' expresses worldview with no excuses

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Brooklyn boy Kevin Devine has seen it all, both inside and outside the music business.

The many facets of the artist's life have culminated into his latest album, "Brother's Blood," which was released by Favorite Gentleman Records on April 28.

Complete with woe-begotten tunes of loss and upbeat pop ballads, the album is Devine's most diversified and mature project to date.

Devine originally broke into the music scene as the frontman of the independent emo band, Miracle of 86. He had previously played in several other projects, but none had succeeded in getting the songwriter noticed.

His first solo record, "Circle Gets the Square," was released in 2002, but remained under the radar.

Since the malcontented vocals and angst-ridden lyrics of his earlier work, Devine has found a more direct approach to musical expression with subsequent albums, writing tighter arrangements and sharper lyrics.

Devine has never been your average songwriter. The loyal New Yorker sites everyone from Bob Dylan to Axl Rose as his source of inspiration.

Sonically, fans of Elliott Smith and Bright Eyes will be dazzled by the musician's ability to produce tuneful poetics with a distinct strumming style that is all his own. His songs fit snugly in the suffering-singer-songwriter classification, though they often manage to evade the cliché due to Devine's earnestness.

The musician's writing has always drifted between his political beliefs and poetical mindset, a combination that makes "Brother's Blood" a statement for the generation.

Many of the new songs were previously released either as EPs or leaked demos. To the artist's disappointment, the album was leaked in its entirety several months before its street date. Devine chose to look at the situation quite optimistically, however.

In a response on his MySpace page, the singer commented, "I understand it, and I'm a touch flattered, a touch bewildered and a touch annoyed…In a sense, I'm flattered anyone WANTS to hear my record two months before it's finished, and add it to the list of things I never thought I'd be able to tell the proverbial grandkids."

Supporting Devine's creative output on the album is his motley band of musicians. The "band" has been a revolving door throughout Devine's recording career, with longtime members including Brian Bonz, Carey Brandenburg and Russell Smith.

On the opening track, "All of Everything Erased," Devine displays the impact of folk hero Elliott Smith on his songwriting style. The song shares the intricate acoustic accompaniment and lyrical poetics that Smith is renowned for.

One of Devine's most endearing traits as a musician is his ability to weave complex, lyrical tales. "Carnival" is the haunting account of man's struggle to retain the will to live in the face of adversity. Tension and dynamics swell into a shouting match between Devine and his guitar as the song comes to a jarring conclusion.

The brilliantly orchestrated "Hand of God (When You Breathe, Breathe…)" shows off Devine's folk know-how. Sighing vocals and razor-sharp wit are poised as an upbeat question to religion.

Showing off his smoother side, "Fever Moon" is equal parts acoustic guitar and sex appeal. Devine croons lines like, "Your lava lips pour forth and branding iron eyes/Fix them unto me and bring me back to life," over the stark instrumentation.

Poppy tunes like "I Could Be With Anyone" harkens back to "Put Your Ghost to Rest"-era songs. While the naggingly upbeat instrumentation does not find Devine in his prime, analytical lyrics of personal exploration make it a worthy addition to the collection.

Whining guitar riffs and passionate proclamations of humanity's end make "Time to Burn (Another Bag of Bones)" an anthem for the modern day.

Devine has quite the famous friend in Brand New frontman Jesse Lacey, who provides backing vocals for the song. "Tomorrow is Just Too Late." The songwriter's influence is often evident in Devine's music, particularly in the torment of the album's title track.

The song is a blatant homage to Devine's deceased brother, who has served as a sort of muse for the songwriter. Raw emotion makes "Brother's Blood" one of his most revealing tunes to date. The shattering conclusion is the sonic equivalent of years of repressed grief.

There are few weak points on the album, relatable in its realness and imperfection.

Every track on the album could have come from a different songwriter. The microcosm of musical styles is only united by Devine's signature scowling rhymes and bright guitar.

Devine does not try to please everyone. He makes records that express his worldview without making excuses. In the case of "Brother's Blood," it is time the rest of the world took notice.

Minutewomen crush 7 home runs in sweep

part about her is that she's a great leadoff hitter. She gives you great speed to run with, and she's a tough out. She's just very consistent and a great weapon in our lineup."

Senior Brandice Balschmiter kept the Rams' (13-36, 2-14 A-10) bats silent all day going four innings in both games. She gave up three hits and no runs in eight total innings on the day. Junior Bailey Sanders pitched scoreless innings to close out both games, giving up one hit and a walk.

For Sortino, though, Balschmiter's performance was enough to get past the Rams but needs to improve as the Minutewomen progress throughout the season.

"I thought she did okay," Sortino said. "It wasn't one of her better performances. I don't think she was as sharp as I'd like to see her go into the postseason. But she did well enough to get the job done."

Normandin started off the double header with a single and was followed by a Whitney Williams walk. After Mollica advanced the runner on a sacrifice bunt and Samantha Salato walked, junior Sarah Reeves came to the plate and drove a double to left field, brining in the first two runs of the game.

After that, the floodgates opened for the UMass offense.

Normandin came back in the second, driving in Jordan Storro with a triple. Williams then cleaned up with one of seven home runs hit by UMass.

A grand slam by Normandin in the third essentially put the game out of reach for URI. But two more homeruns, one by Audrey Boutin in the fourth and another by Normandin in the fifth, closed the books for the win in Game 1.

After Normandin's outstanding performance in the first game, the Rams refused to give her anything to hit. But after Williams reached on an error, Whitney Mollica made them pay with a three-run shot.

The home run ended the day for URI starter Stacey Stanovich, who lasted just three batters, although only one run was earned. That swing was all the Minutewomen would need as the Rams had only four base runners for the whole game; two came from leadoff hitter Amanda Sbei.

UMass came right back in the second inning, busting the game wide open with a five-run inning. Davina Hernandez started off the inning with a solo home run and was followed by a Normandin walk and a pair of base hits. Reeves purged the bases with the Minutewomen's seventh home run of the day.

After the second inning, though, the UMass offense cooled off, getting only one more hit off of the Rams, a triple by Mollica in the fourth inning.

URI led off both the first and second innings with hits off of Balschmiter, but failed to take advantage of them.

UMass gives up lead, fights back for victory

"He just left the ball up a little bit. He was fairly sharp, and he hadn't pitched in for a while and definitely needed to get in there and get to work," Stone said after the game.

Paolini hit a two-run home run to left field in the third inning followed by a Quaranto solo shot, erasing the Minutemen's lead.

UMass rallied however, registering three runs in the top of the fourth inning and four in the fifth inning to take a 9-2 lead.

Sophomore leftfielder Kyle Multner hit a three-run homerun to left-center field in the fourth while the Minutemen took advantage of a Saint's fielding miscue to build a sizeable lead.

Charlie Benson and Sam Mcdonough gave up a combined five runs on six hits, but the Minutemen have been able to survive close games as of late.

"I think we are playing with much more confidence at the end of the game, and that's what It's all about," Stone said.

Junior Jared Freni will face off against conference rival Vermont on Wednesday at 3 p.m. Stone coached the Catamounts for five seasons from 1983-1987, but this season will be Vermont's final season after the program was cut by the school's athletic department.

"Well it's the last year they are playing baseball, which is unfortunate, but it's always special to play them, even though it's been 22 years," Stone said.

Jared Freni is slated to pitch for the Minutemen today when they take on Atlantic 10 foe Vermont at 3 p.m. in Amherst. The junior leads the pitching staff with 10 starts and is second with 52 2/3 innings pitched.

Pitchers building cohesiveness, small ball paying dividends

Gedman outdoes Multner in every extra-base hit category because of his exceptional speed. Multner has only two steals on the season, a third of Gedman's total.

PITCHERS MAKING STRIDES

Mitchell Clegg, Jared Freni, Mike DiCato and Nick Serino have become a cohesive pitching staff for Stone at this point in the season. Eleven of UMass' 16 wins have come from pitching efforts from these four pitchers.

Clegg leads the staff in wins (4) and strikeouts (53). Opposing batters are hitting just .243 against him in 61 1/3 innings pitched. He has an earned-run average of 4.55, which includes giving up a team high nine home runs.

During the week of April 24, Clegg was named Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference co-pitcher of the week, along with Niagra's Marcus Spalding. Against St. Joe's, Clegg pitched the first complete game shutout of his career and the first by a UMass pitcher since 2005. He struck out seven in the effort.

Serino followed that effort with a complete game of his own. He let up just two runs while striking out 10, one shy of his season high. In the only other game in which his strikeout total reached double digits, Serino fanned 11 in six innings against Virginia Commonwealth, giving up no runs while walking five.

Freni's 52 2/3 innings pitched is the second highest on the team. He and Clegg are the only UMass pitchers with multiple appearances that have all been starts. Freni gives up few home runs but this is overshadowed by his 32 earned runs surrendered, a team high.

SMALL BALL, BIG RESULTS

The Minutemen have shown much productivity when doing the little things correctly. Fundamentals have been key for UMass.

The Minutemen are batting .512 with runners in scoring position. UMass has also battled through tough situations; batting .306 with two outs.

Baudinet drives in Tempesta, Minutemen top Siena in 10

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite his teammates' combined 18 hits against Siena, junior centerfielder Brian Baudinet only had one on Tuesday afternoon.

It turns out his was the most important, as Baudinet roped a double in the gap of centerfield in the top of the 10th inning, scoring senior second baseman Adam Tempesta from second, en route to an 11-10 victory over the Saints (10-32).

| UMass | 11 |
| Siena | 10 |

"It was kind of a strange game," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

"We hit a lot; they hit a lot; we had a big lead, and we gave it up, and we couldn't seem to get people out, unfortunately."

While the Minutemen (16-21), were strong offensively, the Saints registered 17 hits, including first baseman Kevin Quaranto's three homeruns.

"We didn't play badly defensively, just everybody hit today," Stone said.

The Minutemen's only error came in the bottom of the 10th when third baseman Sam Boone overthrew sophomore first baseman Peter Copa — allowing Siena's (10-32) third baseman Anthony Giasanti to reach and advancing shortstop William Cardona to second.

Cardona was later caught stealing third by freshman catcher Tom Conley, but UMass was still not out of the jam.

Paolini went 3-for-5 on the day with four RBI's, including a homerun and double.

With Paolini on first and Giasanti on second, Gedman struck out Quaranto on a slider to get his fifth save of the season.

"It was kind of a scramble, but some things went our way," Stone said. "[Gedman] battled and pitched very well at the end."

UMass got off to a hot start with nine runs in the first six innings, but a shaky starting performance by usual reliever Mitchell Eilenberg kept the Saints in the ballgame.

Baudinet flied out to centerfield in the top of the first inning, scoring Boone from third and giving the Minutemen the first lead of the game.

After Jim Macdonald grounded out, Tempesta moved to second and then to third on a wild pitch.

Tempesta eventually scored the second run of the game on a Mike Danato single to give UMass a 2-0 lead.

Eilenberg pitched a perfect second inning before surrendering three runs in the bottom of the third.

Junior Brian Baudinet was hitless through regulation in UMass' 11-10 victory over Siena on Tuesday, but the Minutemen's centerfielder came through in the top of the 10th inning when he doubled to drive in the game-winning run.

Outfield leading at the plate, pitching staff coming around

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The outfield is producing as much as any other group of position players on the Massachusetts baseball team.

Mike Donato leads the Minutemen with 52 hits and a .342 batting average. In UMass' latest game against Siena, Donato went 3-for-5 with one run and one RBI. Donato singled in the first inning to push his hitting streak to eight games.

UMass Baseball

Donato is one of the most consistent bats in UMass coach Mike Stone's lineup. The junior has failed to record a hit in just eight of the team's 37 games. He and fellow junior Brian Baudinet are the only Minutemen to play – and start in – all 37 games for UMass (16-21) this season.

Baudinet is batting .310 this season, leads the team with 31 runs-scored and is tied with senior second baseman Adam Tempesta for second on the team in home runs, with four. He is the only Minuteman to notch 25 runs, 25 runs batted in and 25 walks.

Baudinet is tied with fellow outfielder Mike Gedman for the team lead in stolen bases, with six. He is one of the Minutemen that have produced the most with runners on base as well. Baudinet, Donato and third baseman Jim Macdonald all have 26 hits that advanced runners.

Gedman and Kyle Multner have split time in the outfield, with Multner getting the nod in 13 more of the 37 games played by UMass. There isn't much difference between the two players in run production however – Multner has 16 RBI to Gedman's 13.

The two are tied with three home runs apiece and are similar in many other categories as well. The main difference between the two players is speed. Multner is more of a pure hitter who can consistently put the bat on the ball. Gedman, however, can do much more when the ball is in play.

UMass rebounded after losing its first Atlantic 10 game in almost three years by sweeping Rhode Island in Tuesday's doubleheader by a combined score of 21-0. In the sweep, the Minutewomen hit seven home runs.

After its 49-game conference win streak was ended by Charlotte, the Massachusetts softball team made sure that the ensuing losing streak would end at one.

Putting away Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island in convincing fashion, the Minutewomen swept Tuesday's double header against the Rams, shutting them out twice, 13-0 and 8-0. Each game was shortened to five innings due to the run rule.

Bouncing right back to shut down URI was vital for UMass coach Elaine Sortino after the team's loss to the 49ers.

"It was extremely important because we took two very big steps in the right direction," Sortino said. "It was a very hard day for us Sunday. We were totally out of character, and it was great to see our team come together and just execute across the board, both defensively and offensively."

Leading the way in the Minutewomen's (32-7, 14-1 A-10) 21-run barrage was junior outfielder Carly Normandin. The reigning A-10 Player of the Week, Normandin went 4-for-4 in the first game of the double header with a single, triple and two home runs, including a grand slam, for seven runs batted-in.

At the end of the first game, Normandin had stretched her hitting streak to 23 games, but failed to get a hit in the second outing, going 0-for-1 with two walks. The school record is 27.

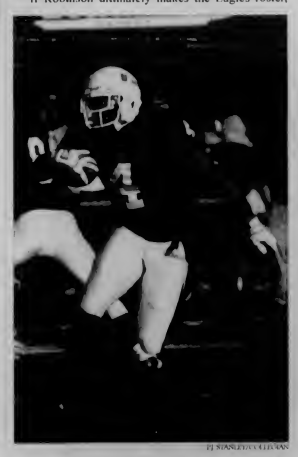
Robinson inks 3-year pro deal with Eagles

Basketball teams sign top recruits to '13 class

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At the beginning of the 2008 football season, there was speculation that, at year's end, some of the Massachusetts football team's seniors would be suiting up in the National Football League the following season. That speculation became reality on Tuesday when former UMass cornerback Courtney Robinson signed a rookie free agent contract with the Philadelphia Eagles.



Robinson, who, like former Minutemen Liam Coen and Sean Smalls, went undrafted in this weekend's NFL draft, was offered contracts by several NFL teams but ultimately signed a three-year deal with the Eagles because they gave him the best chance of making the 53-man roster.

UMass Notebook

While Robinson is the only player to have signed a deal so far, other players are expected to at least get a chance at an NFL camp as pro teams look at undrafted free agents.

The two-time all-Colonial Athletic Association defensive back – UMass' all-time leader in kickoff return yards (1,388) – began his career at Connecticut but transferred after just one year with the Huskies. As a senior, Robinson recorded 35 tackles, one sack, 11 pass breakups and no interceptions, earning him first team All-Conference honors.

If Robinson ultimately makes the Eagles roster, he will join a handful of former Minutemen that went undrafted and went on to have successful careers. Former running back Marcel Shipp has played eight years in the league while Brandon London, who is currently on the Miami Dolphins, won a Super Bowl ring while he was on the Giants during their championship run.

PJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Cornerback Courtney Robinson was a two-time all-Colonial Athletic Association defensive back while at UMass.

MINUTEMEN SIGN TOP RECRUIT

Forgoing offers from Maryland, Cincinnati, Charlotte and Louisville, Terrell Vinson closed out UMass coach Derek Kellogg's recruiting class with a high note with his commitment last week.

A 6-foot-7 forward from Baltimore, Md., Vinson was the final piece to the recruiting puzzle for the Minutemen. And what a piece he was.

Vinson, one of the most highly-touted recruits that UMass has signed, was ranked as a four-star recruit by college sports and recruiting site Rivals.com. He was also tabbed as the 90th best recruit in the nation in the Rivals150 for 2009.

After transferring from Montrose Christian to St. Frances, Vinson recorded 23 points and eight rebounds per game as he was named Baltimore Sun All-Metro after his senior season.

Vinson had first committed to Loyola Marymount but withdrew after Loyola coach and former UMass assistant Bill Bayno left his position. After Vinson re-entered the recruiting process, the Minutemen used their connections to draw the forward to Amherst.

Gerald Stokes, Vinson's former coach, met Kellogg during a visit during the now-coach's playing days. Stokes had been in contact with Kellogg ever since he was named the head coach at UMass.

BIG SIGNING FOR MINUTEWOMEN

Not to be outdone, the Massachusetts women's basketball team signed a major recruit of their own. Jasmine Watson, a 6-foot-3 center from South Bend, Ind., joins guard Danielle Montgomery and forward Shakia Robinson as part of the Minutewomen's 2010 recruiting class.

Ousting soon-to-be sophomore Nicole Jones by one inch, Watson becomes the tallest player on the UMass roster. She joins Jones and Teya Wright as part of the team's corps of post players.

Representing a mobile presence in the post, Watson averaged 11.5 points, 8.7 rebounds and 2.2 blocks per game during her senior season, her lone year at South Bend Washington. During that year, Watson was named and an All-State High Honorable Mention and as an Indiana Coaches of Girls Sports Association second teamer.

For the first three years of her high school career, Watson was a standout at Elkhart Memorial High School, where she totaled 693 points, 607 rebounds and 191 blocks in just three years.

Joining Watson will be the 5-foot-8 Montgomery and the 6-foot-1 Robinson.

Montgomery, who, as a senior, averaged 14.5 points, 2.8 steals, 3.3 assists and 4.4 rebounds will be needed to fill the void in depth at guard with the graduation of leading scorer Stefanie Gerardot and key defender Sakera Young.

Robinson, meanwhile, will help a unit that relied heavily on guard and post play last season. Kristina Danella, a freshman last season, was the only true forward on the team to average over three points per game – mostly because of her perimeter shooting.

SGA debates budget, new RSO funding

By Mike Fox
Collegian Staff

Wednesday night the Ways and Means committee of the Student Government Association senate presented their proposed budget for the next fiscal year.

According to the chair, senator Melicia Morris of Southwest, the committee tried to allocate funding at the same levels as previous years to RSOs that applied for budgets from the SGA. She added that if any groups received increases, they were modest as compared to last year.

Several organizations received cuts in funding, due either to inactiveness or the need to spread the budget among all of the student groups which applied.

"I think it's unfortunate that due to cuts, certain RSOs, not necessarily Southwest Area Government, will be unable to do activities that benefit the entire campus," said Governor of Southwest Chris Faulkner, whose organization received a cut. "I feel that the SGA should work to become more transparent to the entire student body with its budget process and the total funds allocated to each RSO."

Demands on the SGA budget have been increasing steadily each year as more student groups apply for financial assistance. However, in order to satisfy this increasing demand, the SGA has been driven to use its reserves to help handle the increase in sought

Police gear up for springtime

Amherst PD puts programs in place to curtail illegal drinking

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Police Department, in conjunction with the University of Massachusetts Police Department and other local and state agencies, will be ramping up alcohol patrols as more people head outside to enjoy the weather.

This month, the APD used a $10,000 grant from the Massachusetts Executive Office of Public Safety Underage Alcohol Enforcement Grant Program and overtime pay to escalate patrols on underage and public drinking in the hopes of putting a damper on a time of year generally noted for its revelry.

From March 27 to April 17, the APD implemented a program called "Badges in Bars," where, for the first time, uniformed police officers were placed outside Amherst bars to check licenses for authenticity.

During the program, officers visited every bar in town, standing with bouncers to check IDs and arresting those with fake identification for possessing false IDs and potentially, for being minors in possession of alcohol.

The program, explained Capt. Scott Livingstone, was implemented along with a group of other programs the APD has utilized for some time. Livingstone said the APD would also be conducting drunk-driving enforcement this spring, keg licensing enforcement, ID checks at liquor stores and "a few other alcohol enforcement initiatives."

Livingstone furthered that the department would use its reserve overtime funds in the final weeks of the semester to conduct extra patrols in what he called "known problem areas."

"Over the next two weekends – May 1 and 2 and May 8 and 9 – we will be using department funded overtime and have the entire department scheduled to proactively patrol known problem areas [such as] Hobart and the Townhouse Apartments," he said.

"This is something we have done for the past 10 years or so," Livingstone added, explaining that "we have requested additional state police patrol units to be in town as well."

Livingstone said the APD hopes students will enjoy themselves as summer nears, but cautioned students to party responsibly, explaining that, "We will be marking arrests for those found in violation of the laws, open container, underage, noise by-laws – to name a few."

Amherst Police Lt. Jennifer Gundersen, who was in charge of overseeing the "Badges in Bars" program, said the program was prompted by "our concerns about underage drinking, specifically binge drinking, that endanger the safety of our younger community."

Gundersen said the program was a success because bar owners want help keeping underage people out of their bars to avoid fines. Police feel stationing officers at and around bars will have a deterrent effect, added Gundersen.

"The bars appreciated us assisting them combating the widespread use of fake IDs," she said.

"We have criminally charged several persons with possession of a false ID. We believe that our presence in the bars will deter others from attempting to gain entry to a bar unlawfully."

Students, however, say the new measures will do little to reign in their end of the semester activities.

"It's not going to stop anyone from partying," said freshman Chris Constantine. "There are always cops out looking for kids drinking, kids are just going to have to be ready to run," he said.

Fellow freshman Julie Coughlin agreed, stating that she felt some students might tread more lightly than usual, but that she doubted the police would seriously curb any student activity.

"Kids are probably just going to be more low-key about it, like carrying it in a bag instead of a water bottle," she said. "I was at a party last weekend and the cops came and they basically just walked around back with flashlights trying to scare people away, no one I saw got arrested."

On whether the "Badges in Bars" program would be effective, Coughlin had similar feelings.

"I don't think it will stop people from going to bars. My friends and I still go and never have any problems," she said.

Donations on the rise for sperm, eggs

The number of babies born through in vitro fertilization has increased in the past decade as procedures became more standard.

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

More and more women are looking to make money by offering their eggs to couples unable to have children of their own, and men are doing the same thing with their sperm, according to an April 7 article in The Boston Globe.

Egg donor facilities in the Boston area report that their donor applications have gone up from between 25 and 100 percent from a year ago, according to The Globe. New England sperm banks have seen a similar trend over the past six months.

According to the article, infertile couples – and some single women – will pay $20,000 to $30,000 for an egg donation, in vitro fertilization (in which egg cells are fertilized by sperm outside the womb), and transfer to the recipient.

"What we've seen is that the economy seems to have inspired more people to look at alternative ways to earning money," Sanford M. Benardo, president of Northeast Assisted Fertility Group, a company that recruits, screens and matches women who want to become egg donors or surrogate mothers, told The Globe.

The Northeast Assisted Fertility Group has offices in Boston and New York, and applications from women who would like to offer their eggs have doubled in the past year, the article said.

UM professor, students to chase tornadoes

By Matt Robare
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts professor and two graduate students set out for Oklahoma Wednesday to chase tornados.

Stephen Frasier and graduate students Krzysztof Orzel and Vijay Venkatesh from the Microwave Remote Sensing Laboratory will spend the next few months in Tornado Alley as part of the Verification of the Origins of Rotation in Tornadoes Experiment 2 – also known as VORTEX 2.

"What we do here is we build radars in order to trace severe storms and tornadoes," Orzel said, "so it will get easier to predict them."

While meteorologists can predict tornadoes, the number of false alarms amounts to 85 percent of all warnings. If there are too many false alarms people stop taking the warnings seriously, Orzel added.

Tornadoes occur everywhere in the United States, but Frasier and his team head for Tornado Alley because storms occur there most frequently. They will be working with people and radars from other institutions and combining the data for more accuracy.

"The input gets used in what we call a data assimilation experiment," Frasier said. "Here they take the measurements someone has made and ingest them into a model that's running. Hopefully that either improves the prediction or predicts what we see later."

The reasearchers also want to look at what is going on inside tornadoes.

"During tornadoes there's rain, there's hail, there's cows – there's debris. The radar is able to discriminate between those different types of things," said Frasier. "Two polarizations, like polarized sunglasses but with microwaves, and one polarization looks a little different from the other and you can use that to tell you something about the particles."

While Orzel is a newcomer to storm chasing, this will be Venkatesh's second time chasing after a storm.

"It's exciting," he said. "It's a lot of hard work. I mean it's great actually – I haven't had a chance to see something half as spectacular as this in my life, so to me it's extremely rewarding."

"We start the day off typically around noon after an hour's preparation. Once we get started it's a little too intense to stop," according to Venkatesh.

The team spends hours driving to a promising spot and then more hours waiting, said Venkatesh. Most storms happen late in the evening or at night, and the team has ten minutes to take measurements.

"We have tornadoes out of small storms and we have tornadoes out of severe storms," Orzel said. "We have tornadoes which are huge and we have tornadoes which are very, very small. Some last for several minutes and some last for twenty seconds."

Applications up despite low demand

If a woman meets the agency's criteria — which includes being a generally healthy nonsmoker between 21 and 32 years of age with a good family health history, as well as passing physical, psychological and genetic testing — in addition to being "reasonably educated and reasonably attractive," according to Benardo – she will get $10,000 each time she donates.

Women who are accepted undergo hormone injections and then a surgical procedure to have their eggs removed. Since selling one's egg is technically illegal, however, women are monetarily compensated for their time and inconvenience. Fees paid to an egg donor usually range from $5,000 to $10,000.

There is one catch, however.

"Fewer folks are in a financial position [to accept egg donations to start or add to a family]," Amy Demma, founder of Prospective Families, an egg donation agency in Wellesley, told The Globe.

She said that though the number of willing donors has increased, the demand for donors has decreased.

"So while there are certainly more women [donors] lined up outside the door with application in hand, there aren't more getting through the door," she said.

Prospective Families has witnessed a 30-percent rise in donor applications in the past year. Demma said though some of the women are stay-at-home mothers or students looking to finance their education, some just want to help couples who have been able to have a baby of their own.

The Donor Source, which is based in Irvine, Calif., and has a Boston office, has seen a 25-percent increase in applications this past year. So has NEEDS (National Exchange for Egg Donation and Surrogacy), based in Charlestown.

Sperm donations are also increasing, though they garner significantly less compensation. According to the Globe, sperm banks generally compensate donors an average of $85 to $100 per donation and require them to be at least 5-foot-8, a college student or graduate between ages 18 and 38, and in good health.

The Globe reported that California Cryobank, which has offices in Cambridge, recruits mainly on college campuses and asks donors for a one-year commitment, with the average donor contributing two or three times every week.

Communications Manager Scott Brown said applications have gone up 20 percent over the past six months.

"I think the recession has certainly opened up interest," he said.

He added, however, that less than 1 percent of applicants are chosen, as the criteria are based on family history, a physical exam, and analyses of blood, urine and semen.

Paragliding lifts off

BY MAREK WARSZAWSKI
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

FRESNO, Calif. — Man doesn't need wings to soar through the sky like a bird.

Just a parachute, some rigging and a suitable place from which to launch.

Find that hard to believe? The country's top pilots recently converged in Dunlap, Calif., for the U.S. National Paragliding Championships.

Paragliders have been called the ultimate human-powered, portable aircraft. They consist of an inflatable parachute or wing fixed with Kevlar lines that secure to the pilot's harness. The pilot launches by foot, running off inclines or ridges, and steers the wing by shifting his or her weight or pulling brake cords that change its shape.

In optimal conditions, thermal lift allows the paraglider to stay airborne for hours at a time and soar substantial distances.

"It's not almost like flying," corrected Jugdeep Aggarwal of Santa Cruz. "You are flying."

Aggarwal, who has been paragliding for 13 years, is co-director of the national meet, which ends May 2.

Though not set up as a spectator event, the sight of brightly colored paragliders maneuvering thousands of feet above ground is enough to make anyone stop and marvel.

"They're so pretty," said Connie Work, launch director of the Dunlap Flight Park. "Like watching a bunch of Easter eggs in the sky."

Why Dunlap? Turns out the west-facing ridge that looms above the town is one of California's best-known spots for non-motorized flight.

Perched at 4,600 feet elevation near Mount Sampson, the Dunlap Flight Park has been used for hang gliding since the late 1970s. (Hang gliding differs from paragliding in that pilots are strapped to a V-shaped wing with a rigid frame.)

Paragliding, which started in Europe, is slowly but surely gaining popularity in the U.S., Work said.

"Paragliding is like the baby of the hatch – just coming into its own," she added. "It's where hang gliding was 15 years ago."

Paragliders take to the sky off Dunlap Flight Park at the U.S. National Paragliding Championships in Dunlap, Calif.

Once paragliders launch, they're typically not in any hurry to come down. Experienced pilots stay airborne for several hours by getting lift from thermals. Thermals are basically a column of rising hot air formed when the sun's rays warm a feature like a rock face or outcropping.

Once the pilot finds a thermal, he flies in a tight circle, trying to find the spot in the center where hot air rises the fastest. This technique is called "coring."

In addition to radios and GPS units, most pilots use an instrument called a variometer that detects rising or sinking air. The variometer emits an audible signal, and pilots can tell by the frequency and pitch how fast they're climbing or descending.

The more thermals you catch, the longer you stay airborne.

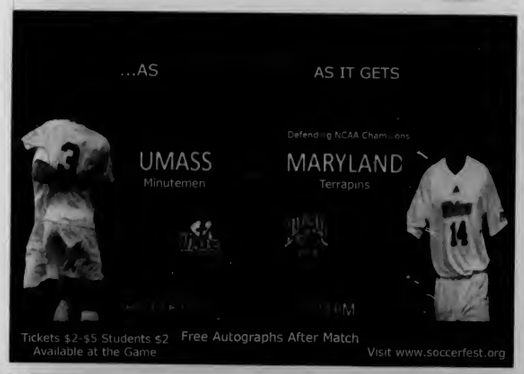
Windy days are not the best for paragliding because wind tends to blow out the thermals.

"The best days are the ones with lots of little puffy clouds, which indicate the top of a thermal," Aggarwal said. "You basically fly from cloud to cloud and catch a thermal at each one."

A paragliding set-up, including the wing, harness and rigging, starts at about $3,000 and can cost up to $9,000. Pilots who launch at Dunlap are required to wear helmets and carry an emergency parachute, just in case something goes wrong.

"It really doesn't matter whether you're 10 feet off the ground, 100 feet or 4,000 feet," Work said. "Most of the accidents happen when launching and landing."

During competitive events, pilots are assigned tasks similar to those used in orienteering that must be completed in as little time as possible. These tasks can be up to 80 kilometers long and require pilots to fly above certain landmarks. GPS units ensure no one cheats.



Like all experienced paragliders, Aggarwal long ago shed any apprehension of soaring thousands of feet above ground with only a patch of inflated nylon protecting against disaster.

"When you're learning, you're really, really scared," he said. "But once you get past that initial fear, it becomes quite exhilarating to have this bird's-eye view no one else has."

Suspects in London bombing acquitted

BY JANET STOBART
LOS ANGELES TIMES

LONDON — Three men accused of helping suicide bombers who killed 52 people in a 2005 attack on London's transportation system were acquitted Tuesday of the most serious charges they faced, a second defeat for prosecutors in the case.

The jury found Waheed Ali, Mohammed Shakil and Sadeer Saleem not guilty of carrying out a reconnaissance mission to help the four bombers who boarded three subway trains and a bus with homemade explosives on July 7, 2005.

Ali and Shakil were convicted of conspiring to attend a terrorist training camp in Pakistan, a lesser charge, and were scheduled to be sentenced Wednesday.

The verdicts ended a three-month retrial of the men, whose previous proceedings last year resulted in a hung jury. The three defendants have been the only people charged in the attacks.

Under British double jeopardy laws, any further trial of the same defendants would have to be based on new evidence, said a spokesperson for the Crown Prosecution Service, adding it was "technically possible but very rare."

Commenting in the Times of London, Andy Hayman, assistant commissioner for London's Metropolitan Police from 2005 to 2007, wrote that the trial "probably represents the last throw of the dice for the police investigation in 7/7. It is frustrating ... knowing that people who aided and abetted the murders of 52 innocent people remain at large."

The accused, who come from the Beeston area of Leeds in northern England, all admitted to being friends of the four men who carried out the bombings but denied charges of conspiracy to cause an explosion. They were accused of scouting the capital for possible targets with two of the four bombers on a trip to London in December 2004.

The jury was shown homemade videos and heard evidence from secretly recorded conversations that showed the accused were close friends with the four bombers: Mohammed Siddique Khan, Shehzad Tanweer, Hasib Hussain and Jermaine Lindsay.

Ali, 25, and Shakil, 32, were arrested at Manchester airport in 2007. They were about to board a plane for Pakistan where, according to prosecutors, they planned to attend a terrorist training camp.

However, the prosecution failed to provide convincing evidence for the jury to convict Ali, Shakil and Saleem, 28, of conspiracy to cause explosions. Susan Hemming, head of the Crown Prosecution Counter Terrorism section, defended the decision to try the men a second time.

"Although there was no direct evidence that these men were involved in the terrible events of 7/7, we felt there was sufficient evidence to show they were involved in reconnaissance and planning for an attack of some kind, and it was in the public interest that such a serious matter should be put before a court," she said. "For the same reason, the decision to go for a retrial following the hung jury in the first trial was correct.

"We would like to pay tribute to the victims and family and friends of those who were killed or injured in the attacks of July 7, 2005, who have waited patiently until now for a conclusion," Hemming added.

There have been no convictions for the bombings, despite police assertions that there must be other conspirators at large. John McDowall, head of the Metropolitan Police Counter Terrorism Command, called for anyone with information about the attacks to come forward.

"While those directly responsible for the bombings died in the attacks, we remain convinced that others must have been involved in the planning," he said to the BBC.

Some family members of the victims said they were still looking for answers and repeated past demands for a government-sponsored public inquiry.

"For almost four years, we have been asking for an inquiry into what led up to 7/7," Graham Foulkes, father of one victim, told the BBC. "We are not looking for people to blame, but we also know that we have not been told the whole truth. We believe that crucial lessons need to be learned."

Reserves tapped to pay for increasing student demand

funding. The reserves are in place to help ensure that the SGA can remain financially stable in case of emergency.

Considering the situation, the committee, along with Allen Brainerd, the director of finance for the Center for Student Development, recommended for the senate to pursue an increase in the student activities fee. The committee predicted an increase of two to five dollars would be necessary to maintain a healthy reserve and financial stability.

Also at the meeting president Ngozi Mbawuike reappointed Rick Pierre as secretary of finance, appointed Cameron Cox as secretary of the registry and incumbent secretary of the registry Sakina Kasmi as deputy secretary of the registry, as well as appointing Sam Dreyfus to the new position of SGA Education and Outreach.

Enjoy ethical dilemmas

It's beverages like Coke that try men's souls.

The Coca-Cola Company – ubiquitous international corporation, producer of refreshing but unhealthy soft drinks and alleged committer of countless acts of human rights violation and environmental degradation the world over – owns or produces just about every beverage sold on campus.

They also pay the University of Massachusetts a shit-ton of money for "exclusive pouring rights" at all dining commons and University-run eateries. Pay attention the next time you go to the Blue Wall: Coke, Sprite, Minutemaid and even those Odwalla bars next to the registers are all products of the Coca-Cola Company.

But a local chapter of Killer Coke, an international campaign aiming to take the Coca-Cola Company to task for murders and kidnappings of union leaders at Coca-Cola's bottling plants in Colombia, is calling on the University to terminate its sponsorship agreement. Last signed in 2005 by former Chancellor John Lombardi, the agreement is up for voluntary extension on August 1.

"Most people don't even know there's an exclusive contract," Christopher Sweetapple, a UMass graduate student involved in the Killer Coke UMass campaign, said in an interview. "We're really concentrating on educating people about the contract and Coke's practices, because political action without information is pretty useless."

Sweetapple said the group isn't even calling for the banishment of Coke products from campus. "Our main goal is to make this exclusive contract non-exclusive," he said.

Ethical dilemma though it may be, the University is unlikely to renegotiate its contract given the school's $46 million budget deficit. According to the agreement, UMass received $1.75 million in "Sponsorship Fees" – paid in annual installments of $350,000 since August 2004 – in addition to high-fructose deal sweeteners like $15,000 for the Chancellor's Merit Scholarship and $150,000 to renovate beverage areas in the dining commons.

They also dropped $20,000 for a Bill Cosby benefit performance. Killer Cosby.

So how exactly does one reconcile the questionable ethical practices of a multinational corporation with the fact that they're essentially subsidizing your education? And what the hell are exclusive pouring rights, anyway?

Well, in part it means the "University will use its reasonable, good faith efforts to maximize the sales and distribution of Products on the Campus, including hawking Products in stands and Approved Cups or twenty-ounce contour bottles during all events when any items of any make or description are hawked," according to the agreement.

Translation: Coke is the sponsor, UMass is the pusher.

As for reconciling Coke's practices with your education, you can opt out of buying their products, but it's tough.

Executive director of dining and retail services Ken Toong said in an interview that despite the exclusive pouring rights Coke holds at the dining commons, the DC's "respect students' right to make decisions on what they drink," and items like water, milk, soymilk, coffee and tea are all non-Coke products offered. All the items in soda fountain, however, are Coke.

At least you can take solace in knowing that when you steal beverages from the DC, you're an agent of some sort of cosmic cycle of karma that starts with marginalized Colombian union workers and ends in a thermos full of Minutemaid.

And you were probably just thirsty.

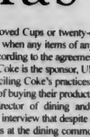
Other venues on and around campus, like the People's Market, Earthfoods Café, Greeno Sub Shop and the Newman Center Café, offer alternatives to Coke products.

"For me, any corporation that sells a lot of shit tends to forget about people and to focus on the bottom line," said Kate Silverstein, a co-manager at the People's Market in an interview. "And that's diametrically opposed to what we're about here."

But the lion's share of drink distribution – from which the University takes about 40 percent commission – goes to Coke. Killer Coke UMass calls it "coercion."

"We're asking the University not to force students to support a company whose practices they find unethical," Fallon Wall, a UMass junior involved in the campaign, said in an interview.

To that end, Killer Coke UMass is planning a "Boycott Coke Day" on Monday, May 4, calling for "an immediate end to the University's exclusive contract with Coca-Cola," according to their flier.



UMass' ties with Coke won't easily be slackened, considering the company contributes everything from sponsorship of athletic and cultural events to advertising revenue and scholarships. It's a quandary of capitalism that a company accused of so much evil abroad can contribute positively to the campus – on an exclusivity agreement, of course.

"It's not like we don't benefit from this; that's not our argument," said Sweetapple. "It's an ethical question."

And that question should come down to individual students, not former Chancellors or a handful of administrators.

No such thing as post-partisan era

Nick Milano

I have spent about the last week and a half or so plugging through a review of Bryan Garner's "A Dictionary of Modern American Usage." Sound exciting? Well, you would be surprised just how entertaining it is.

At the heart of the review is the history of an almost-political battle fought among usage experts and speaks volumes about the natural proclivity for sides to line up around an argument and dig in for battle.

If professors in bow ties with more degrees than a mid-summer heat wave become each others' arch nemeses, then how can there really be an era of post partisanship on the national political level where there are actual stakes?

It may sound odd to hear that someone has been reading a book review of a dictionary, but you have to consider the author. David Foster Wallace, who sadly committed suicide last fall. Wallace penned the review, "Authority and American Usage" – both a hilarious and in-depth look at the English language usage wars.

I first became interested in Wallace after hearing of his suicide. News institutions, like the LA Times and Rolling Stone, reported his death as an incredible loss and credit him with being "one of the most influential and innovative writers of the last 20 years."

Curious to see what the buzz was about, I attempted to dive right into his 1,000 plus page novel "Infinite Jest," but it was too long and too difficult for me to even make it 1/100th of the way through. So I moved onto his two collections of essays, "Consider the Lobster" and "A Supposedly Fun Thing I'll Never Do Again." There I found his real genius.

Wallace could make literary criticism interesting. His take on former tennis player Jane Austin's ghost-written autobiography was surprisingly riveting. His exploration of a Maine Lobster Festival in "Consider the Lobster" basically centered on trying to figure out if lobsters felt pain when being boiled alive – some of the funniest material I have ever read.

"Up, Simba" which appeared in shortened form in Rolling Stone and was re-released this past summer as a book, was a record of his time on John McCain's campaign trail in 2000. Impressed by Wallace's ability to use irony, humor and incredible insight, I even ventured into the aforementioned dictionary review.

In it, Wallace delves into a history of the battles between usage experts. There are tight, WASP conservatives called Prescriptivists that Wallace compares to George Will (apparently they all wear bow ties).

For President Obama to see his most ambitious ideas come to fruition, he must realize that there is no such thing as non-partisanship.

On the other side of the aisle are the Descriptivists who are freer in their acceptance of forms of English. He goes into great detail as to how the two sides stage their point of view, with each putting out their own usage dictionaries. They agree on very little – most importantly, they do not even agree on how to categorize new words.

If there is a segment of the population whose whole life is to decipher the usage of the English language, make determinants about it and decide what proper usage truly is and if this segment of the population has drawn up battle lines that would put Congress to shame, what does that say about the persistence of disagreement?

This is why I never bought into President Obama's post-partisan shtick. How can politicians with everything – according to their ideology – on the line be convinced to move past their disagreements? Obviously Obama does not expect to walk his proposals through Congress, but he seems to rely too much on the idea of a civil debate and conciliation.

For President Obama to see his most ambitious ideas come to fruition, he must realize that there is no such thing as non-partisanship.

In the end, no House Republicans and only three in the Senate voted for it. The battle on health care is going to tumultuous and trying to appease Republicans could result in a health care bill very different from what he wants. Pushing through the Employee Free Choice Act to make it easier to unionize will also require a tough battle; even new Democrat Arlen Specter has already said he will still oppose it.

In the end, perhaps a quick story Wallace opened with at the Kenyon College commencement in 2005, is fitting:

"There are these two young fish swimming along and they happen to meet an older fish swimming the other way, who nods at them and says 'Morning, boys. How's the water?' And the two young fish swim on for a bit, and then eventually one of them looks over at the other and goes, 'What the hell is water?'"

The point is not that you sometimes forget the big picture; the most obvious reality goes unnoticed. At no point in American history has there been a period of nonpartisanship – not even in the world of usage dictionaries.

It is more important the United States undergoes health care reform, makes it easier to unionize and gets out of the economic slump.

The post-partisan era will just have to happen another day.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OFFICER RUDE

Dear Editor,

As I was enjoying the tailgating on Saturday, an underage friend of mine was getting written up for having alcohol. I was looking over at the officers talking to him, and one of the officers approached me.

"Can I help you?" he said sarcastically.

As I began to explain that I was just looking because I've known the kid for a long time and he's a good kid, I extended my hand to shake his.

A hand shake is the ultimate sign of respect and a sign that you really don't want any problems with the person you are extending your hand to.

Not shaking an extended hand is the ultimate sign of disrespect in our culture.

The officer refused my hand shake, and then proceeded to lecture me and talk down to me, judging me like he knew me.

"I kind of feel like you're talking down to me," I said.

He then proceeded to talk down to me some more, before I just let it go. At the end I extended my hand again (being the bigger man) and he shook it this time.

Now, I didn't get this officer's name or his badge number, but I'd like to say a quick something to him:

You kept telling me that I "look like someone who wants to be a leader" and "I need to be a leader".

Nevermind what I look like, you look like an immature power-tripping cop. Being a police officer doesn't give you the right to judge people, talk down to people or be disrespectful in general. And for the record, I know plenty of police officers and all of them are cool, average guys, who I've never seen abuse their powers.

It was probably the most disrespectful thing anyone has ever done to me. If you want to act like a person and talk about the situation, then you can contact The Collegian and I give them permission to give you my phone number.

A VOICE OF EXPERIENCE

Dear Editor,

RE: "Speaker addresses diversity using Family Guy and South Park," by Nick O'Malley, April 16 and "Enabling siblings of the disabled," by Matt Kushi; April 21

As a person with a disability, there are a couple of things that have been written in the past few days that have been upsetting. One is a mistake that may seem small to many, but to me, someone was a wheelchair athlete for six years and whose goal was the Paralympics, is a big deal.

In the article from the weekend edition, Nick O'Malley wrote an article about Matt Glowacki, a speaker who came to campus last week to talk about diversity. Glowacki is a person with a disability, and while I disagree with many of the things Glowacki was quoted as saying, that is not where the mistake is. The mistake was when O'Malley said that Glowacki had competed in the Special Olympics. The difference between the Special Olympics and the Paralympics is huge.

The Special Olympics are traditionally for those people with cognitive disabilities, and it is a competition where no matter what everyone wins something. The Paralympics is a competition for people with physical disabilities, where athletes spend years preparing and competition is tough. The mistake is an easy one, but the distinction is important.

The other article that I wanted to respond to is actually a series of articles. Matt Kushi wrote an article entitled "Enabling support for siblings of the disabled." He has written several different articles about disability, but this one got to me. The article from yesterday was an article about what it means to have a sibling with a disability.

As someone who has a disability, and who has a sibling, this article seemed more like a series of complaints about how horrible his life has been, than anything else. This is not only insulting, it seems downright childish. I know that life for my family hasn't been the easiest because I have a disability, especially for my sister, but that does not mean I have to feel bad about anything.

I am proud of who I am and don't want people feeling sorry for me, or my family. What Mr. Kushi seems to be doing in his column here is trying to make himself feel better about his situation. In the process he seems to be talking for a whole community, one which he himself is not even a part of fully.

I do appreciate that having a sibling with a disability, or even a close friend, might change how people view the world, and that is a very powerful thing. But – as cliché and silly as this sounds – those who have learned to accept despite their differences also have to learn when and how it is ok to talk about those differences.

Every person, whether they are disabled, or able-bodied, gay or straight, black or white, male or female, has a different life experience. I can only speak from my experience, and what my life has been like, and I have been very privileged to have great friends and a great family that supports me and appreciates me, and learn from me.

I am not out to change the world, I can only hope that people will better understand where each person is coming from.

Zoe Crowley

HISTORICAL AMNESIA

Dear Editor,

In the April 17th article "Obama Says U.S. Will Pursue Thaw With Cuba," The New York Times reports that President Obama is open to discussing "everything [Cuba] wants to talk about," including, presumably, the long-standing U.S. trade embargo against that country. President Obama proclaimed his forward-looking intentions. "I didn't come here to debate the past. I came here to deal with the future." Obama called on Latin America to pursue a 'new way' in which the United States is not blamed "for every problem that arises in the hemisphere."

However, the task of developing a new foreign policy toward Cuba must be undertaken with open-eyed historical understanding, including an understanding of whatever problems may generated by current and former U.S. policies toward Cuba. The economic and human consequences of the trade embargo are severe, as Amnesty International notes that the Cuban government is greatly hampered in its efforts to purchase essential medicines, medical equipment and supplies, food and agricultural products, construction materials and access to new technologies. Additionally, the embargo prevents Cuban-Americans from returning to their country of origin, in violation of Article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

During the 1898 Spanish-American War, the U.S. intervened in Cuba chiefly to prevent Cuba from achieving independence from Spain on its own terms. Rebels had promised agrarian reform to the Cuban people, threatening US agribusiness interests in Cuba. Under the Platt Amendment, Cuba became a U.S. protectorate with limited autonomy.

The U.S. had extensive legal powers over Cuba, including the right to maintain military bases, veto treaties, and supervise the Cuban treasury. The rebel general Maximo Gomez lamented the military occupation of the country by our allies, who treat us as a people incapable of acting for ourselves, and who have reduced us to obedience, to submission, and to a tutelage imposed by the force of circumstances??

During the years that followed, the U.S. supported a string of repressive, military dictators, such as Gerardo Batista. What this history shows is that the economic strangulation of Cuba is not aimed at promoting democracy in Cuba, but is instead aimed at punishing Cubans for attempting to pursue independence from de facto American rule.

Mogwai bring heavy riffs to Pearl Street

By Angela Stanowski
Collegian Staff

If post-rock band Mogwai could be summed up in one word, it would be "power." Whether it's the power to move audiences with their melodies or take down walls with sheer volume, the band is certainly a force to be reckoned with.

Mogwai takes their heavily instrumental act to Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton on Saturday, May 2 at 9 p.m. in support of their recent release, "The Hawk Is Howling."

Initially from Glasgow, guitarist Stuart Braithwaite and bassist Dominic Aitchison founded the band in 1995. The group was named "Mogwai" after the Cantonese word for "demon," though the band admits that it never imagined the name would stick. It was initially adapted from the 1984 Warner Bros. film "Gremlins," and eventually caught on.

In past interviews Braithwaite has noted that the name, "has no significant meaning and we always intended on getting it better one, but like a lot of other things we never got 'round to it."

When it comes to their sound, Mogwai is difficult to define. The band uses dramatic swells and dips of dynamics arranged around intricate guitar riffs and bass lines. The multidimensional sound created doesn't waste a single note.

These dynamic feats serve to create stark contrasts between the most delicate of melodies and thrashing guitar muscle, serving as the bulk of their live performances.

Ironically, the band does not support their classification as a "post-rock" collective. Already a broadly defined genre, most people consider any music without vocals to be blanketed in the "post" category, but supporters of the art form wield a more concrete definition.

Like the label of "indie" as a genre, "post-rock" does very little to describe the music itself, only qualifying it as profoundly instrumental music that incorporates the instrumentation of rock music with a decidedly un-rock structure.

Members of Mogwai have been known to argue that their sound in no way resembles the foundations of the genre and thus should not be categorized as such.

Even so, their music has made a notable impact on many of today's post rock assemblies. Their influence can be heard in bands like Explosion in the Sky and This Will Destroy You, who have adapted the heavy guitars and dynamic swells that define Mogwai.

On the matter guitarist and keyboardist Barry Burns commented, "I'm flattered. It's nice to have made an impression on someone as long as it's a positive one."

There is a perpetual sense of doom that permeates many of the band's compositions. Songs like "I Can't Remember" off of their 1997 debut, "Young Team," play on this morose quality to create moving pieces of musical ingenuity.

However, Mogwai isn't always predicting the end of the world with their music – the post-rockers' latest album "The Hawk is Howling," released in late 2008 to critical acclaim, features a somewhat sunnier side of the band.

Bright tunes like "The Sun Smells Too Loud" display the closest thing to optimism the band can muster while retaining their rough rock edge. Based on sparkling synth and guitar in a major key, it is one of several feel good tracks on the album.

Still, songs like "Batcat" and "Scotland's Shame" will whet the appetites of diehard fans of the band's gloom. Released under Matador Records in the U.S., the album is Mogwai's sixth studio recording to date.

Another notable attribute of the band is its penchant for outlandish song titles. Their website explains the phenomenon by saying, "We make up the music first and add the titles later. Because we don't use a singer, it's much harder to come up with a name for a song so it'll be something that one of us has said or seen that sounds good or make us laugh or whatever."

Like many of its contemporaries, the band has fallen into the vocoder craze, adding some sparse singing to their typically instrumental songs. The distortions make vocals unrecognizable, sounding more machine than human.

Popular tunes like "Acid Food," off of 2006's "Mr. Beast" are prime examples of the more lyrical Mogwai. Even so, the vocals are not overdone, appearing as another instrument as opposed to a dominating force in the song.

There is something incredibly unique about Mogwai's sound that no other post-rock band can approach. Between the finely placed guitar distortion and the methodical songwriting, everything seems seamlessly orchestrated.

Mogwai is well known as one of the louder bands in the business, with their live performances reaching thunderous levels. Even so, the experience is well worth a little ear ringing.

Mogwai will be performing at Pearl Street Ballroom with the Twilight Sad Saturday, May 2 at 9 p.m. Tickets are $20 in advance or $23 at the door. The Pearl Street Night Club is located on 10 Pearl Street in Northampton.

Ponytail energize Iron Horse

Baltimore quartet outshone openers the Pains of Being Pure at heart Sunday night with movement and personality

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

Sunday night at the Iron Horse Music Hall Baltimore's Ponytail, and New Yorker's the Pains of Being Pure at Heart, were at two opposite ends of the entertainment spectrum. While the Pains of Being Pure at Heart stood around onstage looking bored, Ponytail exploded into colorful bursts of sound and wild dance moves.

The Pains of Being Pure at Heart were even shown up by the first opener of the night, locals Rabbit Rabbit. Their curly-haired singer Louise Chicoine belted out some enchanting vocals, which although jarring at times, were soothing and seductive overall. Think Karen O of the Yeah Yeah Yeahs, but miles from the city.

This is not to say the Pains of Being Pure at Heart didn't sound good – they just provided nothing visually. Their fuzzy guitar tones shone brightly as they do on their self-titled record, but were too watered down to be affecting. In concept, their sound resembles My Bloody Valentine, but without the scope and without the complete disregard for the listener's eardrums.

Unfortunately this ends up sounding like it should wind up on alternative rock radio alongside the Gin Blossoms. They performed their best song, "Come Saturday," which features keyboardist Peggy Wang-East's vocal mixing with lead singer Kip Berman's to create a memorable harmony.

While light and pristine, the sound was gray and hard to warm up to. Everything was spot-on, though perhaps a bit too calculated and robotic. The band would have suffered little by simply providing more to look at.

During one awkward song break an audience member asked Berman to introduce the band – a seemingly easy task. After only introducing Wang-East, whose uncle was in attendance, the band went right into another song. Their unwillingness to interact added to their dismal aura, though this was quickly turned around by the main act.

Before Ponytail even went on, singer Molly Siegel was doing stretches offstage to warm up her joints. If the Pains of Being Pure at Heart were distant because of crowd wariness, Siegel didn't think twice about who was watching – she was going to go wild no matter what.

She seemed very in touch with the music, her eyes rolling back in her head as she took it all in. Her persona is that of a small child, energetic and euphoric. Her voice matched this perfectly, with her squeals and squawks complimenting the band very well. She certainly does not sing with words, but with enthusiasm. As if at a campfire sing-along in the jungle, she incorporates animalistic bellows and general otherworldly vocalizations into her performances.

The band itself was impressive, made up of Siegel, drummer Jeremy Hyman and two guitarists, Ken Seeno and Dustin Wong. This left Hyman to pick up the entire rhythm section, which he succeeded in doing and then some. Hyman's hyperactive drumming is the band's true backbone, blasting out heavy rhythms and unreal fills.

These frenetic rhythms were met by Seeno's and Wong's dueling guitar tones, Wong opting for harsher slashes while Seeno summoned more pleasing tones, like one might hear in a more recent Dirty Projectors song. Wong was highly animated, almost as much as Siegel, jumping around and kicking his legs into the air, similar to David Byrne's running-in-place dancing in "Stop Making Sense."

The band soared through many tracks from their most recent record, last year's "Ice Cream Spiritual" (We*Are*Free), including "Sky Drool," "Late For School" and album closer "Die Allman Bruder."

"Late For School" found Wong erupting in guttural howls while Siegel did her best to imitate tropical birds until the song broke down almost to a stop, where Seeno realizes "Oh no, I'm late for school!"

"Sky Drool" picked up where "Late For School" left off, once again rumbling and tumbling with complete disregard for structure in favor of multiple bouncing movements. Seeno, Siegel and Wong combined forces for a triumphant ululation of "ah"s – imagine a pack of the Wicked Witch's flying monkeys closing in on Dorothy. "Die Allman Bruder" may be the most consistently upbeat track on "Ice Cream Spiritual," guitars ringing out steadily as Siegel howled on.

During the final song, Siegel forgot the stage and jumped right into the crowd, inducing dancing in about a five-foot radius of her being. After she found her way back to her band, the song fell into a wild blaze of guitars and drums before finally puttering out.

Ponytail sure earned an encore, but resisted. It was understandable – anyone would be exhausted after such a vigorous set. But not to worry – they'll be back July 14 opening for fellow We*Are*Free artists Yeasayer.

Playwright Gardley aids in production of "...Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi"

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

It's rare to see a production worked on by both director and playwright, but that is just the case with "…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi," which opens Friday at the Curtain Theater in the Fine Arts Center.

Marcus Gardley, author of the play, recently joined the faculty of the University of Massachusetts. He was hired in September to work in both the theater and African-American studies departments.

In nine years of writing, Gardley has completed 10 works, six of which have already been produced. In addition to "…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi," two more of Gardley's plays will be produced next season.

"The play is based on a familial story my great-grandmother used to tell me about her father," Gardley said. "He was born a slave and freed himself. He made a conscious choice to live his life as a free person and travel to the North. He dressed as a woman to disguise himself because during that time a black woman was less likely to be captured if she was caught traveling alone.

"She would tell me this story often and each time he ended up somewhere new," he said. "The story always changed and that inspired me to take her story and put my own spin on it."

"…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi," is set in a mythical Civil War era and retells the myth of Demeter searching for her daughter Persephone in an innovative way.

A man named Damascus is brought back to life as a woman named Demeter after having been lynched and castrated. Damascus had been on his way to rescue his daughter, Po'em, from slavery and he continues his search as Demeter, meeting others along the way.

There were several drafts of "… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" in existence when the theater department decided to produce the play, and director Gilbert McCauley was faced with deciding which draft to use.

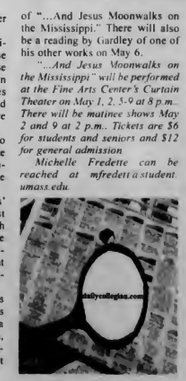
Instead of simply picking one, McCauley worked with Gardley to create a new script that fused various aspects from the other drafts together in a way that seemed most fitting.

"It's normal for me," said Gardley. "I like working with different drafts over time. It is easier for me to put one draft aside and start writing another. Then I compare and contrast later."

Of the new script, Gardley said, "I don't know if I will ever be satisfied with the play, meaning that I feel like it is finished. There's a lot of trial and error in getting a play right. [But] I feel more satisfied with this draft than I have about the previous drafts."

The theater department's production of "…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" will include many cultural elements, such as folklore about Br'er Rabbit and traditional music.

Gardley said he included spiritual elements in his script because he "was fascinated with the use of spirituals as signal songs in the Underground Railroad. Codes embedded in the lyrics instructed slaves as to when, how and where to escape."



McCauley also wanted to include drumbeats, which were often used as a means of communication in African and slave cultures.

According to the dramaturgs' blog for the production, the cast spent one night of rehearsal each week learning the music for the show. Renowned musician, educator and historian, David Pleasant worked with the cast in a drumming workshop.

The theater department has planned several other events around the production, including a gala opening and a silent auction, which will include several paintings created specially for the set of "…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi." There will also be a reading by Gardley of one of his other works on May 6.

"…And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" will be performed at the Fine Arts Center's Curtain Theater on May 1, 2, 5-9 at 8 p.m. There will be matinee shows May 2 and 9 at 2 p.m.. Tickets are $6 for students and seniors and $12 for general admission.

Victory over Rutgers results in ECAC crown, tourney berth

"When you have guys like Jim and Tim, and when they handle the ball, everybody tends to watch. So you got to get guys to move the ball a little bit more and also to get everyone else involved."

Cannella believes that a certain good always come from a loss, and that his team can apply what they've learned from it heading into Saturday's make-or-break meeting with Rutgers.

"John Wooden used to say, 'When you know it all, know everything, what counts is what you learn after you know everything'," said Cannella, following a credence of the legendary UCLA men's basketball coach. "And I think when you win games, people tend to not look at the bad and look at the good.

"I think you have the guys focused when you do lose, because they know they have to improve."

UMass will have to do exactly that, especially against the Scarlet Knights, which always try to outwork, out-scrap and out-hustle their opponents in every way they can. Junior midfielder Justin Pennington leads that charge for Rutgers, dominating on face-offs and scooping up seemingly every ground ball to ignite the offense.

Everything runs through him. He helps them win possession on the face-offs, helps them get them back with ground balls and helps them finish with a team-high 29 points on 15 goals and 14 assists. Limiting his impact will be a major focus for the Minutemen.

"Justin Pennington is an outstanding player and he has the ability to win every face-off and score every goal for them," Cannella said. "It's going to be our job to try to win a few.

"Out-scrapping them is very important to this game. I've been telling our guys we're going to have to fight for everything in this game. Nobody is going to hand it to you you're going to have to go and get it."

Along with Pennington, Kory Kelly will try to take the ECAC title away from UMass. The sophomore attack easily leads the team in goals this season with 25. He gave the Minutemen fits last season, scoring the final three goals to lift the Rutgers to a 7-6 victory in Amherst.

How well the defense and Schneider, who leads the NCAA in save percentage (65.8), limits Kelly and Pennington on Saturday, could dictate how much TV the Minutemen watch on Sunday.

NOTES

UMass leads the all-time series 17-10, with a 7-6 record in New Brunswick ... Rutgers, however, has won each of the last two meetings – both by one goal ... Last year's win for Rutgers over UMass on the last day of the regular season vaulted them past UMass for third in the ECAC standings.

UMass to wait until Sunday for opponent

UM will have 2-week layoff until NCAAs

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Days after clinching its first trip to the NCAA Tournament since 1985, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team finds itself in a state of limbo.

The tournament does not begin until May 10, meaning two weeks will have passed between its 15-14 overtime win against Saint Joseph's and the UMass' first-round matchup in the NCAA's.

The official field for the 16-team tournament will be set this Sunday, with first-round action taking place at college sites. It is unknown whether or not UMass (11-7), which earned the automatic bid by winning the Atlantic 10 Championship, will be selected to receive a home game.

UMass Lacrosse

In its favor is its sterling 8-1 conference and A-10 tournament record.

The problem the Minutewomen could face from the selection committee is the weakness of the A-10 conference as a whole. Only two other teams beside UMass in the conference have an overall record above .500 – with St. Joe's 10-8 record and Duquesne finishing at 9-8. This is not something the Minutewomen had any control over, but it could hurt them nonetheless.

One more strike against the Minutewomen is their 1-4 record against teams in the Top 25 from early in the season. UMass coach Alexis Venechanos purposely picked a difficult early schedule to prepare the Minutewomen for conference play. It certainly has worked out, but those early losses may result in a road game for UMass come May 10.

The quarterfinals will also be held at campus sites on May 16, while the finals will be held at Towson, Md., in Johnny Unitas Stadium on May 22 and 24.

RECORD DRAW

It has been a breakout season for many UMass players, but perhaps no one has improved as much as senior midfielder Meghan Reddy, who has become an expert at winning draw controls.

Reddy set a new career record for draw controls at UMass with 123, but really became great at draws in her senior year. She notched 77 in her senior season alone, which is the single-season record for UMass.

She had 12 draw controls against the Hawks in the A-10 title game, which is third all-time in a single game in the NCAA. Her dominance in the game played a large part in UMass' 28-6 advantage on the draw in the championship.

Venechanos credits this success to both Reddy's tenacity as well as coaching she has received from assistant coaches Acacia Walker and Kristin Blanchette.

"I give a lot of credit to Acacia and Kristin they both do the draw at an international level. Meg just keeps practicing it, and the girls around the circle have been great," Venechanos said following the team's win over St. Joe's. "Meg Reddy has a fight in her that's very hard to coach and I give her all the credit."

IRON WOMEN

Senior defender Jackie Rosenzweig recently set a record at UMass for consecutive starts on the lacrosse team, with 71 straight.

She is not the only player with an impressive streak, though. Junior defender Merritt Cosgrove has made 53 straight starts and could have an outside chance of breaking her record next year.

RAIN OR SHINE

Throughout the season, Venechanos has preached that she wanted her team to play effectively in any weather. They have had to do just that.

They played in a torrential downpour against Richmond – a 13-12 win that saw the game stopped for over 45 minutes due to lightning. They played in similar weather against Temple, crushing the Owls 15-4.

In the championship game against the Hawks, the Minutewomen had to deal with the other end of the spectrum: playing temperatures in Philadelphia that reached over 90 degrees. This comes after practicing in rainy weather in Massachusetts days earlier.

Win or go down

Rutgers game to decide ECAC title, NCAA hopes for UMass

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team isn't watching television together on Sunday night, something has gone terribly wrong.

That would mean the highly-favored Minutemen failed to beat Rutgers Saturday afternoon – costing them the ECAC championship, the automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament and likely any chance of backing their way into the NCAAs.

It would mean the team that has been atop the conference standings virtually all season long and was once ranked No. 12 in the nation would likely not hear "UMass" announced as an NCAA Tournament team during Sunday's NCAA Selection Show.

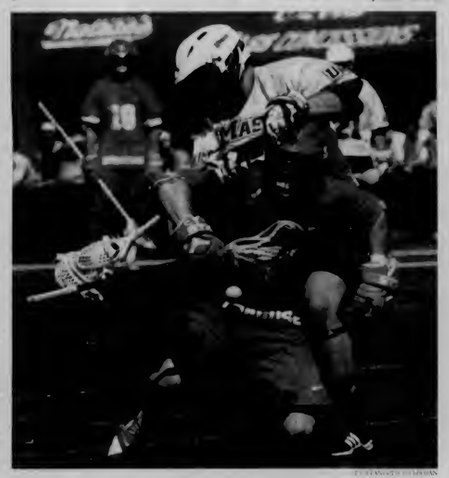
If the No. 15 Minutemen beat a struggling Rutgers team in Piscataway, N.J., on Saturday, they won't have to hope for an unlikely at-large bid into the NCAAs or worry about any of that. A win and they're in for the first time since their run to the national championship game in 2006.

UMass coach Greg Cannella knows that a team playing with nothing to lose against a team that has plenty to gain is a scary match-up to see in a virtual must-win game.

"It's very dangerous. And if you watch the tape, you can see just how talented they are," Cannella said of Rutgers. "It's Senior Day, they're at home, last game of the year – we got to be ready to play."

"And they've beaten us the last two years with the same guys."

But the Minutemen (8-5, 5-1 LCAC), who need a win to claim the LCAC title over Loyola, are a much different team now than they were in the 2008 and 2007 losses to the Scarlet Knights. Powered by an All-American candidate at goalkeeper in Doc Schneider and dynamic offensive threats in Jim Connolly and Tim Balise, UMass has more weapons than Rutgers, which has lost four straight games to fall to 4-10 overall and 2-4 in the ECAC.



UMass struggled in its most recent game, too, but that came against the defending national champions and current top-ranked team in the country – Syracuse. The Minuteman offense couldn't get anything going in front of a record home crowd of 13,222, falling to the Orange, 10-3, at McGuirk Stadium.

"We want to share the ball, we want to create assists – it just seems like in the past five to six games we haven't done that," Cannella said.

See LACROSSE on page 6

It's straight-forward circumstance for UMass this weekend against Rutgers: a win clinches the ECAC championship and the automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament. A loss to the Scarlet Knights likely ends the season for the No. 15 Minutemen.

How well the Minutemen do on face-offs and hustle for loose balls could play a large role in Saturday's pivotal regular-season finale against Rutgers in Piscataway, N.J.

Offense in need of spark

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For a team that averages over nine goals per game, it's hard to say that the offense is struggling.

But for the No. 15 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, that's just what happened against No. 1 Syracuse last weekend in its 10-3 loss.

"This game is about opportunities. We had opportunities, we didn't finish them. And when you play a team like Syracuse, you have to," UMass coach Greg Cannella said after the game. "I'm not sure we shot the ball very well [Saturday], but [SU goalkeeper] John Galloway hung in there and made great saves."

UMass Lacrosse

With point producers like Jim Connolly (32 goals, five assists) and Tim Balise (25 goals, five assists), the Minutemen shouldn't have a problem scoring goals, but against top goalkeepers it's important to take high-quality shots and move the ball around on offense.

"Not how we wanted to come out, obviously. The defense played well but offensively we didn't execute what we wanted to do," Rory Pedrick said after Saturday's game. "I think we all kind of forced it at times and they caused turnovers and they went down on offense and kind of took over the game."

UMass (8-5, 5-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference) is second in the ECAC with goals per game (9.62), just behind Loyola (10.46). The Minutemen's lack of offensive movement is shown with their average number of assists per game (4.08), which is last in the ECAC.

"I think most of all to work for better quality shots on offense; don't try to force it as much. I think that will really be the key [on Saturday]," Pedrick said on what UMass must improve on in its season-finale against Rutgers on Saturday.

PLAYOFF GAME

Loyola kept its playoff chances alive with a 16-7 win over Hobart last weekend. Loyola advanced to 6-1 in the ECAC, while the Minutemen are 5-1. Because UMass holds the tiebreaker over Loyola, a win against Rutgers (4-10, 2-4 ECAC) on Saturday will give the Minutemen first place in the ECAC and an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament.

"Rutgers is like a playoff game now and we should go in with a little edge and be a little pissed off about [Saturday's game against Syracuse] and hopefully we channel that positively," said Doc Schneider.

RECORD-SETTING CROWD

A record-setting 13,722 fans witnessed the UMass-Syracuse game on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium. This broke the record previously set on May 6, 1989 when 12,143 people attended the Syracuse-UMass matchup.

"That was unbelievable, it was great to see everybody come out and support us. It feels really good to have a lot of fans [at the game]," Tim Balise said.

FUTURE STAR

Cody Jamieson, a transfer to Syracuse from Onondaga Community College, played in his first game for the Orange last weekend against UMass. He didn't see much playing time until late in the game, but he did score what would have been Syracuse's 11th goal, if it hadn't been disallowed for a crease violation.

"We were so focused on the game, we weren't really thinking about substituting," Syracuse coach John Desko said. "I looked up and thought it would be a good time to get Cody in and get his feet wet."

Jamieson is expected to be one of the elite players in the nation next season. Last season he played with the Six Nations Arrows, a Junior 'A' League team. He led the league in points (101) with 59 goals in 21 games.

UConn, UM to meet again

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If there's anything to be learned in the last couple days from the Massachusetts softball team, it's that they can bounce back from a loss.

Fortunately for the Minutewomen, they're getting back on track at arguably the most important stage of the season.

After handling Rhode Island in Tuesday's doubleheader with ease, after a rare loss days earlier ended a 49-game conference winning streak, UMass has five games remaining in the regular season, including Thursday's matchup with Connecticut (28-19).

"It was extremely important because we took two very big steps in the right direction," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said after Tuesday's doubleheader. "It was a very hard day for us Sunday. We were totally out of character, and it was great to see our team come together and just execute across the board, both defensively and offensively."

In their second meeting of the season, the Minutewomen will look to put a bit of distance between the two teams early on. UMass (31-7, 13-1 Atlantic 10) won the previous meeting on April 23, 6-4, on a seventh inning grand slam by Carly Normandin.

Normandin is finding her hitting groove again. The junior center fielder had seven RBIs – a single-game school record – in Tuesday's first game, hitting a three-run home run and a grand slam to propel the Minutewomen, 13-0, in just five innings.

In the second game Normandin had her hitting streak snapped at 24 games, three shy of UMass record of 27 held by Barb Marean.

"She's doing what she's been doing," Sortino said Tuesday. "The best part about her is that she's a great leadoff hitter. She gives you great speed to run with and she's a tough out. She's just very consistent and a great weapon in our lineup."

It isn't just Normandin's power numbers that are improving, though. The Minutewomen smacked seven home runs on Tuesday to move their season total to 39.

In a move that might have shown her shying away from using freshman pitcher Sara Plourde, Sortino opted to not start Plourde – her usual tactic – and start Brandice Balschmiter for the second game.

Plourde had the worst outing of her young career in UMass' 11-6 loss on April 26. She allowed 15 hits, 11 runs (five earned) while only striking out two. Plourde's earned-run average is still at a low 1.69.

The freshman is almost certain to start at least one game in the next few days as the Minutewomen have five games in the next four days.

One aspect UMass will have to improve to its game is its fielding. In the Minutewomen's last loss, UMass committed four fielding errors leading to seven unearned runs. Shortstop Whitney Williams currently leads UMass in errors with 11 and is the only Minutewoman with a fielding percentage under .900. Freshman second baseman Kyllie Magill is second on the team with seven errors.

If the Minutewomen want a running start into the postseason then they have to refine all the aspects of their game starting Thursday afternoon against the Huskies.

Junior first baseman Sarah Reeves and the Minutewomen will take on UConn for the second time this season Thursday night at the UMass Softball Complex. UMass won the first meeting, 6-4, on April 23.

Stone drops one to familiar opponent

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After an extra-inning victory Tuesday afternoon, the Massachusetts baseball team couldn't find its stroke Wednesday, falling to visiting Vermont, 10-4, at Earl Lorden Field.

Vermont 10
UMass 4

Junior right-hander Jared Freni lasted just 2-1/3 innings for the Minutemen, giving up seven runs on seven hits, while walking two batters and striking out three.

The Catamounts scored five runs on five hits in the third inning to break the game open. The Minutemen put together late rallies in the seventh and ninth innings, but the game was already out of reach.

Sophomore left fielder Kyle Multner doubled to right-center field, scoring freshman catcher Tom Conley and sophomore first baseman Peter Copa in the bottom of the seventh inning in UMass' biggest threat of the afternoon.

UMass (16-22, 8-10 Atlantic 10), attempted yet another late comeback in the bottom of the ninth with a double by Matt Gedman that scored Copa, but senior second baseman Adam Tempesta fouled out to first base to end the game.

The visiting Catamounts (12-25), whose program will be cut after this season, came out strong early, with a run in each of the first two innings against Freni.

Ethan Paquette went 4-for-5 on the day, while the Catamounts registered 15 hits off four different UMass pitchers.

Pitcher Greg Lutton was impressive for UVM, going five solid innings, surrendering just four hits and one earned run for the victory.

Tempesta and Multner led the way for UMass with two hits apiece.

The Minutemen, who won six of their last eight games, look to get back to their winning ways when they start a three-game weekend homestand against St. Bonaventure on Friday.

GAME NOTES

UMass coach Mike Stone coached Vermont from 1983-1987 to begin his head coaching career. He has been the coach at UMass, which is his alma mater, since 1988. He has a 550-465 record during that span.

UM Hillel, SAFI honor Tel Aviv

By Josh Walovitch
Collegian Staff

Wednesday was Israeli Independence Day and University of Massachusetts Hillel collaborated with Student Alliance for Israel to host a Tel Aviv-themed Independence Day party on the campus lawn where hundreds of five-college students celebrated Israels' 61-year anniversary of independent existence.

The event was planned and coordinated by Dana Golan, an Israeli fellow at UMass Hillel.

The celebration – complemented with live music, a variety of food, crafts, hookah tents, activities and a moon bounce – lasted all afternoon.

Earlier this month, Israel's second largest city, Tel Aviv, celebrated its 100th birthday, and UMass Hillel commemorated Israeli Independence Day by creating models of the famed parts of the city. Each section of the event was representative of a famous area of Tel Aviv. The grill station emulated the Carmel Market, Tel Aviv's largest market place, where fresh meat and produce are sold. A tabling area selling hookahs and other crafts was called Shenkin Street, a trendy area in Tel Aviv home to clothing stores and cafés. Tented hookah stations imitated the Florentine area of Tel Aviv, where travelers find many hookah cafés.

"This event signifies that Israel is independent and this is something that all Jews can be proud of in the world today – that we have a Jewish state we can call our own," said UMass freshman Ethan Sobel. "I think it's unique that even people who don't live in Israel are celebrating its independence just to show our loyalty to our state and to show how much support is there for the Jewish people and the Jewish state of Israel."

A small gathering of protestors showed up to the event promoting their disagreement with the Israeli occupation of Gaza, but left shortly after their arrival.

"In Israel people are faced with this all the time in a much more violent way, they have rockets coming down on them all the time yet still on the independence day in Israel they find a way to celebrate life and freedom and it's amazing," said former SAFI president Mike Feder. "They came and it's just like Israel, so they can be happy with what they are doing and we can be happy with what we are doing and all is well. It's a beautiful day."

Amherst reports swine flu

Two probable cases of H1N1 swine flu at Amherst College were identified by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health (MDPH), according to a campus-wide e-mail from University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert C. Holub late Thursday night.

"While the cases have not yet been confirmed by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC), the students involved are receiving appropriate treatment, doing well and expected to recover fully," Holub's e-mail said.

According to The Daily Hampshire Gazette, there are two confirmed cases at Amherst, but as many as six students were tested.

The College cancelled all events planned for the weekend and advised any students with any symptoms not to attend class.

"We also ask that students, especially those with symptoms, limit their visits to public places," Amherst College President Anthony Marx said in an e-mail Thursday night.

2009 Distinguished faculty awards announced

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

From left, UMass professor Scott Garman, professor Thomas Hannum and associate director of The Minuteman Marching Band John McCarthy are three of the six recipients of the University's Distinguished Teaching Awards for 2009.

The highest honor awarded for excellence in teaching and learning at the University of Massachusetts has been given to four faculty members and two graduate students.

The recipients of the Distinguished Teaching Award are Scott Garman, assistant professor of biochemistry and molecular biology; Eileen Hayes, associate professor of nursing; Thomas Hannum, associate director of the Minuteman Marching Band; John McCarthy, Distinguished Professor of Linguistics; and teaching assistants Kimberly Buescher for languages, literatures and cultures and Christina Smith for sociology.

"These awards are very selective and I was pleased and surprised to get one. It recognizes some of the effort that we in the biochemistry program put in to teaching," said Garman.

Garman added how appreciated he felt because he was selected for the award personally by the students.

"It's nice to get the honor from the students. I'm pleased the students like what I'm doing in the classroom," said Garman.

Hayes called it a "wonderful moment in [her] life."

"I feel so humbled, validated, excited and thrilled to receive it. It confirms so much of how I felt about teaching and about students over the course of a long career. It was a very moving, thrilling highlight to my career," said Hayes.

McCarthy was "relieved and surprised" to hear that he had been selected.

"I had been nominated before and I wanted a long time and I didn't think I was going to get it. It became a goal and a target for me. It was always in the back of my mind," he said.

The four faculty winners were announced on April 16 at the Celebration of Teaching Dinner. The two graduate student winners will be acknowledged on May 6 at a luncheon hosted by John Mullin, dean of the Graduate School.

The Distinguished Teaching Award was established at UMass in 1962 and is regarded by faculty and staff as the campus' most esteemed prize for teaching.

For faculty members, the honor includes a plaque as well as a check for $3,500. Teaching assistants earn $2,000. The names of the six winners will be added to the long list of the 130 previous recipients inscribed on permanent display in the Lincoln Campus Center.

The six recipients will be recognized during the Undergraduate Commencement on May 23.

In the Campus Center the display reads, "The Distinguished Teaching Award honors university teachers who have been nominated by students and alumni as demonstrating extraordinary commitment to teaching and student learning at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. This award may be bestowed on a faculty member only once in his or her lifetime."

Nominations for the award are made by current and former undergraduate students to a committee of undergraduates, made up of faculty members and graduate students (many of whom are previous winners of the prize). This committee ultimately makes the final award decisions.

Powers talks stress, dating

By Kat Marner
Collegian Staff

Speaking to a full room Monday afternoon, University of Massachusetts psychology professor Sally Powers delivered her lecture, "Hormones and Lovers' Quarrels."

The lecture was the culmination of the 2008-09 Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series. After her talk, Powers was awarded the Chancellor's Medal, which is "the highest honor bestowed on individuals for exemplary and extraordinary service to the University," according to the event webpage.

Powers is a family researcher and the director of the Center for Research on Families at UMass. In Monday's lecture, she shared the results of her studies on stress' effects on depression, such as how, "conflicts with the people we love the most translate through the body in the form of stress, especially in adolescent females and women."

According to Powers, depression is the leading cause of disability worldwide, and the greatest mental health problem in the U.S. Powers added that 16 percent of people will be affected by depression sometime in their life, with women twice as likely to be affected.

One aspect of Powers' study reviewed the depression rates of adolescents, defined by the study as people in their second decade of life. Powers discovered that depression rates in females in particular skyrocketed around puberty, and she revealed that this may be due to changing reactions from other people to the female's appearance, rapidly evolving brain chemistry or the increased stressors that come with adolescence.

Powers studied three types of relationships: parent-adolescent, dating-couple and newlywed, specifically focusing on individuals' coping styles, especially differences related to gender. She videotaped partners in each type of relationship, discussed a conflict that was important to them and then had both impartial observers and the people directly involved in the conflict rate the behaviors they witnessed according to standardized judgments such as "giving in" or "sarcasm."

Another crucial aspect of her studies was to test the saliva of each partner before, during and after the conflict to analyze it for hormones that are excreted when a person feels stressed or threatened.

When reviewing the parent-adolescent conflicts, Powers discovered that the males she studied were more likely to exhibit behaviors classified as "sarcasm," when "giving in." She commented that this allowed the males to "withdraw from the conflict and protect themselves." The females exhibited a behavior she termed "engaged submission." She said that the females would also give in, but they would do so whilst smiling and giggling in order to "protect the relationship and de-emphasize their own voices."

When studying the dating couples, the saliva analysis showed that males were actually more stressed during the anticipatory phase of the conflict rather than during, and that females were slower to recover their stress levels afterwards.

Audience members reacted differently to the presentation. One asked if the researchers considered using same-sex couples. Powers explained that they were trying to and that only a small sub-group was used for this particular study. Another student brought up that the researchers should not forget that correlation does not prove causation, and other chemicals could be at play.

(Editor's Note) A new beginning

Ben Williams

So another paper is getting whacked by the media revolution and the spiraling economy, but this one is a little closer to home.

I know when I was growing up, pieces of The Globe were always lying on my kitchen table. And in my living room. And my computer room. And by age six I was pretty adept at tearing through the Sunday paper for the comics section. So I can see why a lot of people are up in arms about The Globe possibly folding in the next month – it certainly put an uneasy feeling in my stomach.

Fortunately that's not going to happen. I hope. I'm about 80 percent sure on that one.

Sure The Globe is losing money faster than it can be burned, and if a kid blew $135 million in the last two years his pops would be pretty pissed too. I'm sure the New York Times Co. is.

But while The Globe is projected to make $135 million fewer than it was in 2007, it is still coming up with something like $500 million in revenue, according to The New York Times investors' website.

If I had a kid who was pulling in half a billion dollars a year, I wouldn't want to get rid of it either, and I'm equally sure the New York Times Co. doesn't.

So The Times gave The Globe a month to get its act together and cut $20 million.

This is neither something new nor is it something impossible. Like Matt Rocheleau reported in his series published in The Collegian earlier this week, the newspaper industry has been going through monumental changes. The Christian Science Monitor, one of the oldest and most internationally respected publications, stopped printing a paper version of its product earlier this year, and numerous others have declared bankruptcy.

But this is the first time that such a large publication is facing an outright closure; it will not be the last. I would be willing to wager that every other major publication in the world is holding its breath to see how this thing turns out.

This has happened because newspapers got in a little over their heads. For a long time, newspapers were the way to get information out to the masses; and if a company wanted to advertise, newspapers were the only choice. Then radio came along. Then television. Newspapers were settling with a smaller share of the market, but still settling – that is until the bombshell hit: The Internet.

A lot of journalists get a bad taste in their mouths when somebody says "Internet," which is understandable because it is largely why they will be out of a job soon.

On the other side, for the increasing group of journalists who grew up with the Internet, it is a realm of unlimited possibility just like it is for everybody else.

The Globe, like many other newspapers, has been digging its own grave for a long time by clutching onto a print product. When the newspaper industry realized people were demanding online versions of papers, they rushed to post that print online. It just forgot one little thing … money.

This is something a 4-year-old could have figured out: "Hey, if you can pay for something or get it for free, what do you want to do?"

The business model for the past 10 years has been based on a hope and a prayer that people will continue to want the feel of paper between their hands … it's amazing that it has worked this long.

The advent of the Internet, blogging and cable news is not a bad thing. It is, in fact, a great thing and allows the news industry to do what it has always wanted to do: provide a wider diversity of opinion and information to people as soon as it is possible. Sure, the mainstream media is largely controlled by a small number of companies, but a greater number of platforms allows for this greater potential.

It is now possible to read about all the day's news in any number of voices on the Internet. Maybe John Stewart and Stephen Colbert are all the news people want to hear every day. Great, I'm with them. But remember that those blogs and shows are commenting on and analyzing stories that were written by journalists who actually report.

Journalists have been afraid of this change in the industry, but what they don't understand is that the industry has always changed – and an insistence on standing still is more productive of failure than anything else.

If The Globe goes under, it won't be anybody's fault except The Globe's, though a number of people will be happy to place the blame on The Times Co.

Of course it does not help that, according to sources inside The Globe, the Times Co. was happily taking The Globe's profits and not reinvesting in the paper.

It should be remembered, though, that money alone does not reinvent the newspaper industry, and nothing short of that is what The Globe needs to survive.

No one knows how readers will absorb the news in the next 10 years, but it probably won't be on a sheet of paper.

The Globe's being on the brink of failure is not a bad thing either; it is a necessary thing. Like the ghost of Christmas future, sometimes a cold, stony grave needs to be laid out before someone's ways are changed.

With any luck, The Globe will come out of this ordeal with a better paper and a model for the news industry's future.

Bankrupt Chrysler, Fiat merger in works

By Justin Hyde and Greg Gardner
Detroit Free Press

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama shepherded Chrysler LLC into a historic bankruptcy Thursday, backed by more than $8 billion in new government aid designed to allow a partnership to emerge in 30 to 60 days.

The dramatic move, supported by the United Auto Workers and Chrysler's major lenders, signals to bondholders at General Motors Corp. that the Obama auto task force will act on its vow to take GM into a similar bankruptcy if they do not agree to swap their GM debt for shares in a reworked GM.

Obama emphasized Thursday that the move was meant to secure Chrysler's future and a return on the government's investment, and that it was the best route to preserve jobs at the third-largest U.S. automaker. But as part of the plan, Chrysler said most of its factories will shut down Monday, and will restart when the company emerges from bankruptcy.

"The necessary steps have been taken to give one of America's most storied companies a new lease on life," Obama said.

But the president also criticized a group of investment firms and hedge funds that did not agree to a $2.25 billion cash offer to cancel $6.9 billion in Chrysler's debt, saying they were holding out "for the prospect of an unjustified taxpayer-funded bailout." Chrysler's main task in bankruptcy will be to force that deal on those lenders, which the administration said it had the necessary votes from enough Chrysler debt holders to accomplish.

"They were hoping that everybody else would make sacrifices, and they would have to make none. Some demanded twice the return that other lenders were getting," Obama said.

"I don't stand with them," he added. "I stand with Chrysler's employees and their families and communities. I stand with Chrysler's management, its dealers, and its suppliers. I stand with the millions of Americans who own and want to buy Chrysler cars. I don't stand with those who held out when everybody else is making sacrifices."

Chrysler Chairman Robert Nardelli, who will leave once the company emerges from bankruptcy, said it would continue to operate its three brands and Mopar parts service.

"My No. 1 priority has been to preserve Chrysler and the thousands of people who depend on its success. While I am excited about the creation of the global alliance, I am personally disappointed that today Chrysler has filed for Chapter 11," Nardelli said. "This was not my first choice."

Fiat Chief Executive Sergio Marchionne said the deal "will create a powerful new automotive company, while helping preserve jobs and a manufacturing industry that is critically important to the U.S. and Canadian economies."

Under Chrysler's bankruptcy, filed in New York Thursday, the government will provide $3.3 billion for Chrysler to operate in bankruptcy.

UAW's health care trust fund will own 55 percent of the new Chrysler, while Fiat will hold 20 percent, the U.S. government will hold 8 percent and the Canadian and Ontario governments will together hold 2 percent.

The Chrysler LLC motor company has declared bankruptcy, and has been given $8 billion by the government to allow time to merge into a partnership with Fiat motor company.

Dealing with mental health

By Alexa Milan
The Pendulum (Pepperdine University)

One out of four college students who have sought mental health counseling have seriously considered suicide, a new pilot study by the Center for the Study of Collegiate Mental Health discovered.

The study, which included 28,000 students currently receiving mental health counseling at 66 institutions nationwide, also found there has been an increase in self-injury and alcohol and substance abuse because of issues like depression.

"I think they've nailed the main issues right on the head," said Paul Fromson, professor of psychology. "The most common ones are things like depression, anxiety, substance abuse, eating disorders or unhealthy eating patterns. Those are probably, in terms of classic diagnoses, the top four."

Fromson said while some issues vary from institution to institution, overall the pilot study does provide new insight into what problems students are experiencing.

"Across the 66 institutions they sampled, there really is a remarkable degree of consistency," Fromson said. "I would not be surprised to find out that the same kind of categories elsewhere are very similar here."

According to Fromson, the increased rates of self-injury, substance abuse and suicidal ideations, as well as actions, are likely manifestations of depression and anxiety.

Rates of depression and anxiety are likely on the rise for a number of reasons, including the economy, said Gary Bailey, part-time counselor at Ellington Health and Counseling Center.

Bailey said there is more pressure to succeed in the job market now, so students are either anxious about finding jobs or about finding an alternate plan if they can't get a job after graduation.

"There's this intense pressure to perform even better academically to get into graduate school," Bailey said.

According to Bailey, other economic factors that may contribute to collegiate mental health issues could be financial problems at home. If students' families are experiencing financial stress, those feelings of anxiety could transfer to the students.

Perhaps the most troubling statistic in the study is the number of students who have seriously considered suicide, Bailey said.

He said it is difficult for counselors to determine which students experiencing issues like depression, anxiety, substance abuse and eating disorders need the most help, but it is an important part of their job.

"I think we serve as risk management for this environment," Bailey said.

Another issue the study addresses is the rate at which psychotropic medications, or medications for psychological problems, are being prescribed.

"There has been a dramatic increase in the number of prescriptions for psychotropic medications to increasingly younger populations," Fromson said. "The numbers are staggering."

The study cites an increase in Prozac use among high school students, and Fromson said other psychotropic drugs are being prescribed to middle school-aged students and younger.

Fromson and Bailey both said that these medications do work for many people, but it is problematic that many HMOs are willing to pay for medication, but not therapy.

"Medications tend to be seen as a quick fix," Bailey said. "[Society] has pushed for briefer and briefer forms of therapy that are not necessarily the best way to treat those illnesses."

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" – SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

Heralding the Boston Globe's Doom

Matthew Robare

Wednesday morning I saw a photo on the front page of The Daily Collegian from the "Save the Globe" rally. As if a bunch of people showing up at Faneuil Hall to talk will make any difference. Instead of talking they ought to be buying copies of the Boston Globe. The problems are financial and not conversational.

The Globe, according to The Collegian, is on track to lose $85 million this year. That's well over $1 million a week. Readership is down, advertising is down and the Globe's parent company, the Times Co., wants $20 million in cuts by Friday, May 1.

As usual, we find that the union is responsible for holding things up. While $20 million in cuts will be hard to find in any case, the Boston Newspaper Guild will not do anything to save the paper for as long as they can. Unions have forced the closings of many businesses, which negate the entire purpose of the union.

As admirable as union goals might be, I believe that it is far more worthwhile to distribute the $20 million as widely as possible – hourly pay cuts, no more paid internships, closing the D.C. bureau and streamlining the organization to run more efficiently with fewer people – than to be obstinate and have the whole paper shut down.

I also ask, what are the most relevant sections of the newspaper? Cinema, theater, music and the arts section in general can be cut wholesale. If someone wants to advertise a play or band they should be more than welcome to pay for it.

I would even suggest that the sports section could be scrapped, since we have ESPN, NESN, radio and the sports teams' official websites to discuss every angle of every play of every game.

The three most important sections of the Globe – and indeed, any newspaper – are the local, non-local and editorial sections.

I say this, not because I am a news and an editorial/opinion writer, but because news is the main province of a newspaper and letters to the editor constitute one of the most valuable public forums for the discussion and exchange of ideas in a polite and rational manner. Internet forums will probably never be able to replace that.

But all these are stop-gap measures. Newspapers on the whole have been declining in circulation and profitability for years. The question is, why?

Why has the Herald thrived despite a 38 percent drop in daily circulation? By adapting. By being competitive in a changing market.

The usual suspects are the Internet and 24-hour news television chasing away advertising and making it cheaper to access news stories. But those things in and of themselves are not responsible – the real failure is that of the newspapers to compete with the newer forms.

The Boston Herald, despite its circulation decline, is still profitable. Herald editor Jules Crittenden said in a blog post, "Actually the Globe does stand alone, spectacularly alone. The Globe is hemorrhaging more than $1 million a week...Reporting in the recent past has indicated the Herald operates in the black. Knock on wood. The Globe neglected to mention that."

Why has the Herald thrived despite a 38 percent drop in daily circulation? By adapting. By being competitive in a changing market.

For too long newspapers sat on their laurels and did not even bother to compete. Entrepreneurship stagnated in the world of print media – every region of the country had as many newspapers as it could support and advertising wasn't going anywhere – and they failed to care about CNN or the Internet. But both 24-hour TV and the Internet can get news out there faster than a daily newspaper. Now, the race does not always go to the swift, but when "old news" comes to mean news first reported an hour ago and not 24 hours ago, it's time for innovation.

What form will that innovation take? If I knew that I'd be looking to buy a publishing company, but I think that first, there will be no more weekend editions and eventually newspapers will be weekly or twice-weekly.

Because of that, the emphasis of news writing will be on in-depth human-interest stories and investigative features. I can also see special editions being printed for important events. But I think that the future of newspapers looks a lot like their past: as the mouthpieces of political parties. Parties have the money and influence to finance newspapers – even if they're online. They also have the desire in the form of educating voters about beliefs and candidates. This will lead to a boom in independent media, either desiring greater objectivity or alternative voices.

But that's the future. It will happen when it happens and when it does, it will know where to find me. I'll be the one reading The Boston Herald.

Filling the spiritual void

When I first came to the University of Massachusetts as a freshman, I had just come back from a spiritual journey to Mecca. With a renewed spirit blazing, I walked on campus thinking I was on top of the world and nothing could take me down. But alas, four years later, one month before graduation, I find myself with a raped spirituality.

Ebad Rahman

My downfall was not because my religion, Islam, conflicted with anything I learned during my education. I found that they actually work well with each other. It was not because I lacked a religious community or institutions – there is a mosque one bus stop away. I was defeated by the lack of spiritual culture at UMass.

Universities provide a detrimental environment in pursuing goals related to religion. Students need to be better grounded in religious concepts, at least, as a philosophical, social and political phenomenon that Gallup polls indicate 88 percent of Americans affiliate with. Although universities are seen as epicenters of secularism, it does not excuse ignorance.

Doctor Stephen Prothero, chairman of the religion department at Boston University, in the book "Religious Literacy", wrote, "every year colleges provide bachelor's degrees to students who cannot name the first book of the Bible, who think that Jesus parted the Red Sea and Moses agonized in the Garden of Gethsemane, who know nothing about what Islam teaches about war and peace, and who cannot name one salient difference between Hinduism and Buddhism."

What's a Gethsemane? That's the first time I've heard of it. I am one of those about to get a bachelor's degree without basic knowledge.

Tom Krattenmaker, of USA Today, reported, "data [shows] that religion and spirituality are alive and well at colleges and universities. A recent study by the Higher Education Research Institute at UCLA finds that more than half of college juniors say 'integrating spirituality' into their lives is very important.

The University's fear in developing spirituality and the student body's failure in pursuing spiritual endeavor is creating a giant void in our campus's spiritual culture.

Today's juniors also tend to pray (67 percent, according to the UCLA study) and 41 percent believe it's important, even essential, to 'follow religious teachings' in everyday life." The study highlights the difference in a student's desire to understand religion and actually understanding it.

Especially at UMass, spiritual culture fails to meet the demand of students wishing to learn more about religion.

Here, students are free to discuss science and politics in residential TAP/RAP programs, but lack a program based on spiritual discourse. The University of Wisconsin built a seven-story dormitory, housing 280 students, that focuses on interfaith dialogue and also provides religious services for its residents.

We also lack organizations that scatter across the religious spectrum. The UMass Center for Student Development website lists 16 religious student organizations on this campus.

This number stands in horrible contrast to University of California at Berkeley, which has 50 religious student organizations.

The class choices are also limited. I tried to enroll, a few semesters ago, in History 112: Intro to World Religions, the only class I saw fit to relinquish my religious ignorance. I was shocked to discover that not only was the class full, but that a list to register started filling up a semester before. Next semester, in fall 2009, only 120 students in a university of about 20,000 students will get to take the class and learn about one of the most influential topics in history.

The responsibility is also on the students to develop an atmosphere of spiritual pursuit, whether it is to quell intellectual curiosity or to find a spiritual calling. We need to engage in dialogue and seek out answers if no one is guiding us.

Many students who desire to travel a spiritual path feel alienated from finding answers because they find that they cannot give up their lives of drinking and fornicating to take up a life of spiritual integrity.

From an Islamic perspective, drinking and fornicating are marginal faults aside from being ignorant. Authentically searching for answers and failing is excusable, but purposely not seeking answers is blameworthy.

Many students who would want to learn about religion as a sociopolitical force find it surrounded in stigma. Why wouldn't it when religion is constantly portrayed in relation to violence, ignorance and intolerance? But why be ignorant yourself? Find out what religions say about violence, tolerance and the pursuit of knowledge and see for yourself what it has to offer.

The University's fear in developing spirituality and the student body's failure in pursuing spiritual endeavor is creating a giant void in our campus' spiritual culture. Graduating students are entering the world with a large deficit in understanding a powerful force in our world, and other students are leaving without answers.

A University is meant to educate its students and foster a drive to learn no matter how much controversy or stigma a subject has. We need to learn about religion whether we are taught it or not. We need to learn about religion so that when we enter society, we come in as the aware and competent people we are meant to be.

The dangers of voluntary self-segregation

Rachel Dougherty

The dangers of voluntary self-segregation

Diversity is taken seriously at the University of Massachusetts. So seriously, we have seven cultural centers, six cultural/lifestyle communities and 22 cultural RSOs. UMass sells "cultural diversity" like Geico sells auto-insurance.

According to the UMass website, "UMass Amherst rigorously seeks ways to highlight and celebrate its diversity . . . You'll find friends and neighbors from a range of backgrounds, differing in ethnicity, race and religion, the region or country they came from, the languages they speak, their sexual orientation, and their economic background."

What the brochures don't prepare you for is unpacking your bags in Northeast and having a hallmate say, "welcome to the Asian section." Or that first cafeteria conversation when someone explains to you the break-down of the different sections of UMass, from Sylvan to Southwest.

Despite what the website says about diversity at UMass, students still tend to stick mostly with people of their own race. The student body is statistically diverse; of the 19,373 undergraduate students on campus in 2009, 19.4 percent are ALANA, or minority, students.

But are we integrated, really?

What begins as voluntary segregation in the dorms and cafeterias has the potential to lead to worse – and possibly involuntary – forms of segregation.

Wadia Samadi, a second-year international student from Afghanistan, says that the place where self-segregation is most obvious on campus is in the dining commons. "As soon as you enter, you see a huge mass of similar race/nationality grouped together in different sections of the cafeteria. You first think about where you sit and then you think of food."

Given a choice between sitting at a table of Afghan students and a table of American students, Wadia says she would sit "most probably with the Afghans, because that is where I automatically feel I'd fit in due to the fact that we share the same culture and language."

I wondered, if I had walked into the cafeteria, not knowing a single person, and had to choose between sitting at a table of all white students and a table of all black or Asian or Afghan students, which would I choose? Probably, I had to admit, the table of all white students. It's not a conscious act of racism, but subconsciously I would assume that the people who looked like me, talked like me and dressed like me would be more likely to like and accept me than the people who didn't.

Wilbemina Agbemaklido, a sophomore at UMass, says that students self-segregate because "it's easier. I think it's a human thing to want to be with people of your own kind. You don't have to think so much about what you say, or whether it will offend someone."

Being a minority is uncomfortable. It's exhausting to have to fight cultural differences all the time. So we retreat into our groups, because it's easy, because it's safe, because a lot of the time – it just makes sense.

Is it wrong for people to be more comfortable with members of their own race and to seek a community with the people with whom they feel they have the most in common? Is that really something to feel guilty about?

It's not wrong, but it can be dangerous. It's dangerous because the less familiar we are with people of a different race, the less comfortable we are with them. It's easier to demonize a group of people when you have no contact with them and know nothing about them.

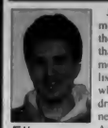
What begins as voluntary segregation in the dorms and cafeterias has the potential to lead to worse – and possibly involuntary – forms of segregation.

My freshman year in college, I roomed with a girl from North Carolina. She told me once that she'd never had a class with a black student until she came to the University. At her high school, there were black classes and there were white classes, and that was "just how it was." I don't know if the segregation was encouraged by the school, or a sort of self-segregation on the part of the students. Probably it was a little of both.

Racism is more blatant in the South than it is in the North, but people are also more open about it. Northern racism is subtler and our means of segregation are subtler, instead of segregated classes, we have segregated communities.

Even in the residential areas on campus, you can see the breakdown of different racial groups. According to Agbemaklido, self-segregation in residential life happens "a lot. All the Asians live in Northeast, the blacks in Southwest, the whites in Central and Orchard Hill. I live in Central and there are only five, maybe 10, other black students in my building."

No one ever says that they decided to live in Northeast because it's Asian-friendly. Or that they chose Orchard Hill because they really wanted to live with white people. But even before we get to campus, most of us have already heard the stereotypes. The segregation continues beyond college. If you were to ask your parents why they chose one community over another, they would never say it was because of race. They would say the schools were better, the housing was more affordable or it was closer to family.



Yet, still we wind up with these segregated communities.

We don't choose where we grow up, who lives in our neighborhood or the kind and color of the people we go to high school with. But we can choose who we sit with in the cafeteria and who we talk to in classes.

These things happen, and no one ever talks about them. If we can't speak honestly about race on this campus, we might wake up one day and realize that the segregation we thought was voluntary isn't.

Off-label pill popping

Eli Gottlieb

Just this week, I found myself so out of touch with the common college student that The New Yorker showed me up. Margaret Talbot published an excellent report on what she calls the "defining drug" of our era: so-called neuroenhancers, specifically Adderall and Ritalin.

As we all should know, these drugs are hard stimulants prescribed to psychiatric patients diagnosed with one of the forms of Attention Deficit Disorder. In the interest of truth and giving everyone the benefit of my experience, I was diagnosed with a form of this disorder (it seems to run in my family) at age 17 and prescribed extended-release Focalin, 10 milligrams every day in the morning as needed.

The New Yorker article brought me up to date on modern attitudes toward the use of this stuff my doctor prescribes me by saying that large numbers of American undergraduate college students take these hard stimulants "off-label" (meaning without a prescription and very, very illegally) to enhance their capacity to do academic work in the wee hours of the night.

Honestly, I don't want to have a debate over whether you have some right to put these evil little pills in your body. At this school we all know the drug user wins in the court of public opinion for having the "right" to put any substance he can obtain or synthesize into his body.

Instead, I just want to convince everyone that while using this stuff without a diagnosis may help your grades (though The New Yorker claims that a study found most students who use Adderall off-label have a GPA of 3.0 or less) and let you party more with less of that nasty, interfering sleep stuff, as a university community and as a society – we ought to refrain from it.

The side effects give us our biggest reasons for refraining from large-scale use. They include sleep deprivation, dehydration, discomfort with eating and drinking, inability to socialize properly, the possibility of addiction and mild psychosis.

Not only have doctors verified these, I've experienced them all at one time or other.

If lots of people really take stimulants to study, we'll have to sit in classrooms or exam rooms full of irritated, semi-psychotic jerks who haven't slept due to cramming material they should have studied months ago at the last minute.

If the average UMass student exercises, eats right and sleeps enough, they can keep their mental focus up to levels quite suitable for studying for finals without pills.

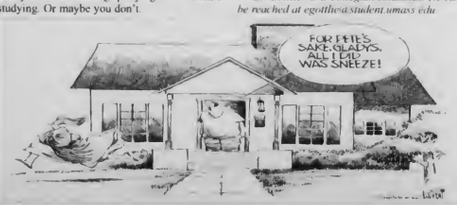
Apparently the people taking these things don't do so due to a disorder or disability that keeps them from working at normal level, but simply because they can't fit everything into their life that they want to fit.

Hell, as The New Yorker put it, "a 2002 study at a small college found that more than 35 percent of the students had used prescription stimulants non-medically in the previous year."

I wish to explain to everyone the difference between my use of hard stimulants and theirs. I use a hard stimulant in a limited dosage, only once in a 24-hour cycle, in an extended-release form, with a diagnosis and regular care by a doctor – the kind with a medical doctorate.

I maintain a regular sleep schedule, refrain from using any other drugs with my Focalin (even caffeine), eat healthily and exercise often. I don't even like the stuff, and try to avoid taking it when I can.



"You," so to speak, take the stuff in whatever dosage you can get, as you feel you need to study, most likely to complement an unhealthy lifestyle of alternating partying with frantic studying. Or maybe you don't.

Quite frankly, most people don't need it anyway. If the average UMass student exercises, eats right and sleeps enough, they can keep their mental focus up to levels quite suitable for studying for finals without pills. If they haven't studied things because they spent too much time partying, that's what I call "their problem".

I take Focalin to bring my own focusing abilities up to normal, but even I don't need it most of the time if I keep up those good habits. It especially helps that each of these things feeds into the others, adjusting the human physiology to make overall health easier to achieve.

Thus, I can honestly say that the best thing for students, for the UMass community and for society as a whole is to treat stimulants as a specific treatment for a specific problem, and to remember that a healthy lifestyle and hard work put into academics leave you with better grades and more friends than popping pills to study would. If you really need to dope yourself to stay up, try one of those energy drinks the C-stores sell.

Flavor of syndication

Shayna Murphy

Maybe it's the wisdom that comes with age — or that comes from skipping class to watch too many marathons on VH1 — but something about all these celebreality shows just doesn't seem so authentic to me anymore.

Back in 2005, I was still willing to believe. Back then, Flavor Flav had just had his heart crushed by Nordic skyscraper Brigitte Nielsen — a woman so ridiculously hot in the Eighties that even Sylvester Stallone had to get in on the action. Brigitte stumbled her way into Flav's heart on the "Surreal Life," her incomprehensible accent (a probable mix of eastern European and Jack Daniels) no obstacle for the famed hype man.

On "Strange Love," the spin-off that chronicled their flourishing romance, Flav brought Brigitte home to meet his six kids and his mom, the dread Mrs. Drayton. But it didn't work out, and back to Europe she went, into the arms of her much younger, very patient fiancé, who seemed to have no qualms whatsoever about leasing his woman out to Flavor Flav for a few weeks to film a torrid, nationally televised love affair.

Flav seemed understandably saddened by the way things went down with Brigitte, and so weren't the rest of us. Enter 15 ladies of questionable quality and intent, out to compete for what remained of Flav's heart in what would henceforth be known as "Flavor of Love."

Some of the ladies on the original "Flavor of Love" were nice-looking (like Smiley), while others seemed a bit rough around the edges. Contrary to her name, Hottie was, in fact, not so hot, especially once she jumped into a pink bikini that impressed upon most viewers the importance of network censorship.

And some of the ladies on the show were just plain crazy, which is how "I Love New York" later came into existence.

"He combined my two favorite things — vodka and ranch dressing," says New York, a.k.a. Tiffany Pollard, about a potential suitor on one of the two installments of the hit show. "I Love New York." After being spurned twice by Flav on the show — but first bedded by him, which imparts a timeless lesson onto young girls (don't have sex with Flavor Flav until after he gives you gold fronts) — VH1 decided to make it up to New York by giving her the chance to find love on her own terms.

But since Flav and New York, the dating shows on VH1 have morphed into something else entirely — a fiery, voracious beast that feeds on high ratings and cheesy game show challenges, all aimed at bringing the show's contestants one step closer to winning the love of whichever pseudo-celebrity is up for grabs.

"Rock of Love," the dating show starring Bret Michaels of Poison fame, seemed more promising than "Flavor of Love" at first. Having been raised on Poison, I approached the show with more enthusiasm than perhaps is tasteful. Sadly, the show quickly turned predictable.

The girls, all made of silicone, restayline and far too much peroxide, were essentially the same as the girls on "Flavor of Love," but blonder. Around this time, certain questions began to plague me as I anxiously waited through each week's elimination ceremony. Could this be scripted? Could this all just be the same show, over and over again, in a different wrapping?

Certainly as matchmakers, VH1 can't boast the same success rate as eHarmony. Cupid's arrow has made some strange love matches over the years, including the oft-forgot liaison between Whiteboy and Pumkin (alums of I Love New York and Flavor of Love, respectively).

Yet its season finale pairings, like that of Flav and Deelishis or Bret and Ambre, always seem to founder in the harsh light of actual reality.

Maybe "Daisy of Love" will be different. The show, which premiered this week, stars Daisy de la Hoya, the runner-up of "Rock of Love 2."

Riki Rachtman also joins the "cast" of "Daisy of Love," under the auspices of needing to protect Daisy from the onslaught of "fakers" and "phonies" that have somehow inveigled their way into the mansion (no words on how Ms. La Hoya was essentially the same thing back on "Rock of Love 2" have yet been uttered).

But despite what VH1 suggests, they're not friends. In fact, Rachtman and Daisy probably only know each other from the "Rock of Love 2" reunion, when he was helping shield her frail body from the blows and scratches delivered by Heather, the feisty runner-up of the original "Rock of Love."

Rachtman's role as Daisy's sidekick on the show seems like a calculated one, intended to inject a little life and star power (Rachtman was the much-lauded former host of "Headbanger's Ball") into an otherwise bland show about a groupie trying to find love with a bunch of aspirant musicians and burn-outs.

Which, come to think of it, doesn't seem so bland, after all. The dating shows on VH1 may be scripted and may all be the same, but at this point, who cares?

Anything beats "The Bachelor."

Sobering look at Steve-O

By Robert Lloyd
Los Angeles Times

HOLLYWOOD — "Look at that idiot" — those words pretty much account for the phenomenon that is "Jackass," the former MTV stunt show that has continued to live through big-screen sequels and assorted spinoffs and self-referential documents.

The latest of these is the unexpectedly serious, and seriously moving, "Steve-O: Demise and Rise" (Sunday on MTV), which follows cast member Stephen "Steve-O" Glover down into a maelstrom of drugs, alcohol and bad, bad craziness and back up out of it.

There is more to the idiot than you might have imagined.

The chance of getting hurt was what made the daredevils of old — the barnstormers, the barrel jumpers — exciting. But getting hurt is where "Jackass" begins.

Pain and damage are givens; survival, not skill, is the point. Among Steve-O's stunts: stapling his scrotum to his thigh; getting branded; bobbing for jellyfish; going through a car wash (outside the car).

In a different context, this might be labeled performance art, but in this one it is basically an extreme version of the unpleasant or dangerous — or unpleasant and dangerous — things small boys, and frat boys, dare one another to do. It is only supposed to be amazing and funny.

Most recently known — and known for the first time by many — as a contestant on "Dancing With the Stars," the sober-for-a-year Steve-O is a likable guy, articulate and intelligent, with a goofy laugh and a toothy smile. ("Dancing" judge Bruno Tonioli noted his "confused puppy" charm even as he gave him low grades.)

Even as he goes completely off the rails, it is hard not to root for him. "He was either going to end up incarcerated, dead or famous, and we didn't really know what," sister Cindy says.

Not every person willing to risk his neck for a laugh, or for the love of the crowd, is a case for treatment, of course. ("Jackass" colleagues Jeff Tremaine and Johnny Knoxville, who finally threw a suicidal Steve-O into the hospital, seem quite balanced here.) But Steve-O is hooked not only on cocaine and nitrous oxide, which he runs through in frightening amounts, but to the stunts and to the camera.

It's like the joke about the man who cleans up after the elephants in the circus. When it's suggested he might want to look for other work, he replies, "What, and leave show business?" (Indeed, we see the star fall face-first into a tub of what the man in the joke cleans up.)

You can look at "Demise and Rise" as a cautionary tale or as exploitation, and it's probably a little of both. But either way, it's an impressive, effective piece, and even somewhat formally restrained as MTV documentaries go — the footage needs no help.

Happily, it ends happily (although Steve-O cautions he is not "cured," only sober day to day), with the 34-year-old lost boy hosting a skate party for kids on the occasion of his first sober birthday since he turned 16. It's beautiful to see, and nobody gets hurt.

"Steve-O: Demise and Rise" airs Sunday on MTV. The special follows Stephen "Steve-O" Glover's decline into drugs and alcohol and back up out of it.

Outlook cloudy

This year's Cannes Film Festival to be hit by economic depression

By John Horn
Los Angeles Times

The yachts will still cruise in, but there won't be as many. The parties will continue well into the night, yet not with the same excesses. And while most American distributors will still come to the French Riviera, some others won't.

Given all that's gone wrong in the economy, it's not surprising that the 2009 Cannes Film Festival will be more restrained than in recent years. And that could present a problem for independent filmmakers and their financial backers hoping to score a big sales payday or even land a theatrical distribution deal.

The festival, which runs May 13 to 24, is best known for its starry, black-tie premieres and creatively ambitious competition films – which this year includes Quentin Tarantino's "Inglourious Basterds" and Ang Lee's "Taking Woodstock" – but the heart of Cannes is its film market, where some 3,000 features come looking for global distribution offers.

Many of the movies in the Cannes market this year are low-budget exploitation titles, but a fair number are filled with recognizable stars like Hilary Swank and established directors such as Peter Weir.

A handful of the several dozen movies in Cannes' main showcases also are looking for American distributors, including the late Heath Ledger's "The Imaginarium of Doctor Parnassus," Rachel Weisz in "Agora" and director Ken Loach's "Looking for Eric," which features soccer superstar Eric Cantona.

Even though domestic box-office admissions are soaring, the global movie business – particularly overseas DVD and television sales – is slumping. International distributors can't get financing to buy movies, piracy is cutting into overseas ticket sales, foreign currencies are falling in value and key international territories have essentially discontinued acquiring American films.

"Japan has stopped buying English-language movies," says Jere Hausfater, the chief executive of the international sales company Essential Entertainment, which is headed to Cannes to sell the comedy "Middle Men," starring Luke Wilson and James Caan. "The indigenous Japanese movies are continuing to dominate the box office."

On top of everything else, the supply and demand equation has been out of whack; there were more movies (thanks to the surge of production investment from private investors such as hedge funds) aimed at fewer distributors (with former buyers like Paramount Vantage, Picturehouse and Warner Independent Pictures closing up shop), an imbalance that swung to the buyers' advantage.

Quentin Tarantino's "Inglorious Basterds" will premiere at this years Cannes Film Festival. Ang Lee's "Taking Woodstock" will also be seen for the first time.

"There was a glut of product," says Hal Sadoff, a sales agent at International Creative Management. "And either buyers paid too much for the movies and got burned, or a lot of movies had to sit on the sidelines and then didn't get bought."

Sadoff believes that with private equity drying up (he estimates independent productions are down about 50 percent in the last six months) and new distributors coming on the scene (upstarts include Oscilloscope Pictures and Peace Arch Entertainment), the playing field is slowly returning to level.

All the same, a look at some of Cannes' 2008 sales shows how hard it was for even the festival's highest-profile titles to make a splash at the domestic box office. "Two Lovers" grossed less than $3 million for Magnolia, "Hunger" barely passed $125,000 for IFC Films and Sony Pictures Classics saw its Charlie Kaufman purchase, "Synecdoche, New York," squeak past $3 million.

Consequently, the amount distributors lay out for movies may continue to shrink. Although the headline-making deals can total in the tens of millions of dollars, far more film festival transactions are sealed for a fraction of that amount – sometimes tens of thousands of dollars.

And some distributors will give Cannes films only limited theatrical releases, banking instead on revenues from video-on-demand cable TV channels and Internet streaming. Although that low-cost distribution formula may work well for video-on-demand leaders such as IFC Films and the nonfiction website Snag Films, it doesn't necessarily put more than a handful of dollars in the pockets of the filmmakers and their backers, who may be out multiple millions of dollars.

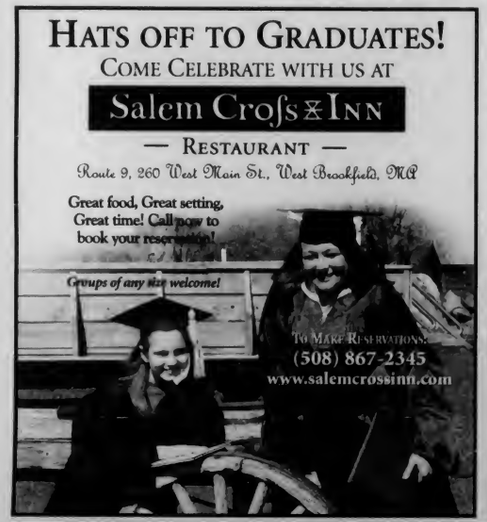
Still, Arianna Bocco, IFC's vice president for acquisitions and productions, is confident that the Cannes buyers will pull out their checkbooks if a movie delivers.

"The movies that are really good, people will fight over," Bocco says. "People need product. We need to keep the pipeline going."

John Sloss, who will be in Cannes selling "Dr. Parnassus," "Agora" and the Sundance film "Precious" to distributors, says even though Paramount and Warner Bros. closed their specialty film divisions, it doesn't mean the audience for highbrow films has gone away.

"There are problems at the parent companies," Sloss says, "but there aren't problems with people wanting to see independent films."

Producer Guy East's Exclusive Media Group will head to Cannes with several films in the market looking for distribution, including director Weir's "The Way Back" (with Colin Farrell) and "Invasion of Privacy," which stars Swank.



East believes that with so much uncertainty in the market, buyers and audiences will gravitate toward quality stories told by talented filmmakers.

"What we try to focus on, above all, is the screenplay. We spend many millions of dollars on our screenplay development, which is unusual for an independent," East says.

Those scripts, in turn, attract A-list talent.

"And those are the kind of movies that we think we will be able to sell," East says. "It all comes back to quality."

Critical A-10 series ahead for UMass

Bonnies come to Amherst for 3

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

After suffering a 10-4 loss at the hands of Vermont, the Massachusetts baseball team will continue its four-game home stand at Earl Lorden Field with a weekend series against Saint Bonaventure.

The Minutemen are closing a week in which their five-game winning streak was halted by La Salle followed by a narrow 11-10 victory at Siena followed by the rude homecoming by way of a 10-4 loss to the Catamounts on Wednesday.

Vermont ended the eight-game hitting streak of outfielder Mike Donato, who leads UMass (16-22, 8-10 Atlantic 10) with 52 hits. Prior to the game against the Catamounts, Donato hit a home run and three doubles with eight runs batted in during the hitting streak.

"He swings the bat well and he just needs to stay within himself," UMass coach Mike Stone said of Donato's physical ability. "He's got a lot of talent as a hitter, as do a number of other kids.

"It's just a matter of getting themselves in the correct frame of mind to be patient and aggressive [while] at the same time getting quality pitches to hit and executing."

Last season in a 6-1 UMass victory over the Bonnies (21-17, 7-11 A-10), junior outfielder Brian Baudinet went 3-for-4 including three singles and a run scored. He was 7-for-12 with two RBIs and two runs scored by series end.

Baudinet has had 11 multi-hit games this season and his speed always makes him a threat on the basepaths, evident from his six steals this season. However, simply putting the ball in play gives Baudinet a chance to use his speed. His four triples put him one behind Fordham's Danny Leach for the conference lead.

He's also shown great patience at the plate. He's earned a team-leading 26 walks this season.

While Baudinet is expected to help lead the offense, the Minutemen will rely on their starting pitchers to limit the Bonnies at the plate. Probable UMass starting pitchers this weekend include Mitchell Clegg, Nick Serino and Jared Freni.

The Minutemen (225) and the Bonnies (212) are the two lowest run-scoring teams in the conference so each team will most likely look for its defense to dictate the outcome of the series.

Saint Bonaventure (4.78) and UMass (4.83) are third and fourth in the conference, respectively, in earned-run average, and opposing batters are hitting under .280 against either team, so plate discipline should be a key element to each team's results this weekend.

"We need to make a move," Stone said of his team as the season winds down.

"We have only three weekends left and we're right in the middle of the pack. It's time for people to be ready to step forward and play their best."

UMass last faced the Bonnies at Fred Handler Park, where SBU took two-of-three from the Minutemen in Saint Bonaventure, N.Y., in 2008.

Saint Bonaventure enters the series coming off of a 4-2 win over Niagara.

The Bonnies are led offensively by senior first baseman Anthony Randich, who totes a .348 average and 47 hits which include four home runs and 30 RBI, all of which are team highs.

Sophomore shortstop Jesse Bosnik has started in all 38 games for SBU this season and leads the team in runs with 32 and is second to Randich in hits, with 45.

Two Bonnies have six wins on the mound this season: junior Dennis Sherba (6-1) and senior Jim Britton (6-3). Opponents are hitting .254 off of Sherba, who has 42 strikeouts in 56-1/3 innings.

Britton shares the team-high of 45 strikeouts with sophomore Cael Johnson. Britton has also saved 10 games for SBU.

Johnson (4-4) has been a workhorse in the St. Bonaventure rotation. He's tossed four complete games this season and has a 3.42 ERA but has shown a weakness for the long ball. So for this season, Cael's given up a team-high eight home runs.

Track teams set for A-10s

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts track and field teams will travel to Charlotte and attempt to repeat their solid performances at last year's Atlantic 10 Championships, as well as redeem themselves after a disappointing showing during the indoor season.

The Minutemen finished fourth out of 12 teams at last year's outdoor championships and are projected to finish third this year. UMass coach Ken O'Brien said that the prediction is giving his team "aspirations of a solid placing."

The UMass distance runners will have to give another sterling performance if the Minutemen are to be successful. They have been outstanding prior to the championship season and have given several dominant performances. In the season opener in Connecticut the Minutemen took six of the top eight spots in the 5,000-meter event and took five of the top six positions in the 10,000-meter run at the UMass Six-Way Meet.

Sophomore Sean Busch has provided a boost for the Minutemen in the field events, notching four top-six finishes in the pole vault. He finished first at UMass Six-Way Meet, and posted the third best mark in school history (15 feet, 5 inches) at the Larry Ellis Invitational.

At the indoor A-10 Championships, the Minutemen finished seventh with freshman Philip Weltman (400-meter run) and sophomore Daniel Schwartz (heptathlon) giving the top performances of the day for UMass with third-place finishes.

"The athletes who regularly finish in the top-five need to meet expectations," said O'Brien. "Kids in the 5-to-10 range need to respond to the championship level competition and move up a few spots. The people that are usually just in the background can easily become scorers."

The Minutewomen hope to improve on last year's sixth-place finish despite the fact they are predicted to slip to seventh.

The anchor for the team throughout the outdoor season has been its field athletes. The trio of Lisa Wilson, Stephanie Aguguo and Ida Okkonen has been incredibly consistent. Wilson has not finished lower than fourth in any event this season, while Okkonen has won three events and Aguguo has posted three top-two finishes.

Wilson is undoubtedly UMass performer of the year and will have a huge impact of the meet. In consecutive weeks she set school records in the discus and the shot put. At the Larry Ellis Invitational she set the discus record with a throw of 156-02 and broke the shot put record the next week at the UMass Pre-Conference Meet with a mark of 44-11.50.

Junior Holly Heinricher has quietly been a solid contributor, and has been arguably the team's best sprinter and one of its most versatile athletes. She has finished first in the 200 meter dash and fourth in the long jump. She has also been a key member of the relay teams.

At the indoor competition, the Minutewomen scored 49 points en route to a sixth-place finish. Aguguo (triple jump) and Wilson (shot put) led the way with fourth place finishes.

Charlotte has been tabbed to win both the men's and women's titles.

The meet will take place at Charlotte's Irwin Belk Track and Field Center on Saturday and Sunday. Saturday events begin at 9 a.m. with the combined heptathlon, while Sunday's events start at 8:45 a.m. with the combined decathlon.

Seven-run inning lifts Minutewomen

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Pitching changes are usually made to help a struggling hurler.

But after just two innings, one hit and two runs – both unearned – by Connecticut's Rachel Crossin, she was taken out by the Huskies coach, Karen Mullins.

"I'm glad she did," Massachusetts softball team's coach Elaine Sortino said after a 9-0, five-inning victory over the Huskies Thursday night at the UMass Softball Complex. "I thought she was doing a pretty good job with us."

The Minutewomen would go on to record 10 hits and seven runs off two Huskie relievers in the following two innings to sweep the season series.

|---|---|
| UMass | 9 |
| UConn | 0 |

Freshman Ali Adelman first relieved Crossin in the third inning where she gave up one hit. In the fourth, Adelman recorded just one out as she was knocked around by the No. 19 Minutewomen (32-7) for six hits and six runs.

With UMass leading 2-0, the Minutewomen hit three consecutive singles to start the bottom of the fourth to extend the lead to three. From that point on, Adelman faced another four batters and threw just six more pitches.

Senior Davina Hernandez took a strike from Adelman before hitting another single. The single drove in two runs – giving Hernandez five in her last three games after she hit a three-run home run against Rhode Island earlier in the week – and Hernandez advanced to third on a throw to the plate.

"I didn't have any hits for a few games and I was just sticking with it because I was hitting the ball and not having anything to show for it," Hernandez said. "I just had to stay positive and not let it get to my head and that is what I've been doing, just working really hard in practice on my hitting."

Hernandez scored on the next pitch as Carly Normandin hit a ground ball to the Huskies second basemen, Jennifer Ward. Instead of getting the force out at first, Ward threw home where Hernandez was sliding head first, narrowly avoiding the tag. Normandin was thrown out as she tried to advance to second.

Two pitches later, Whitney Williams singled to the right side of second base and Whitney Mollica followed on the next pitch with a single on the opposite side of the bag, knocking out Adelman.

Jessie Stavola replaced Adelman and struck out Sarah Reeves, the first batter she faced, before struggling like Adelman did. The Minutewomen hit another three consecutive singles, scoring the three runs, two of which Stavola inherited.

"We hit seven home runs last two games so we can do that," Hernandez said after the game. "But today we put the ball on the ground, hit line drives, put it in the gap and I think that was a good representation of what everybody can do and how every single person on the team can contribute."

The fourth may have been the inning where UMass opened the game wide open, but the third inning was where the Minutewomen got their momentum. Brandice Balschmiter – five innings, seven hits, no runs, two walks and four strikeouts – began the top of the inning by walking the leadoff hitter, Jillian Ortega, and then giving up two singles. With the bases loaded and no outs, UMass' ace struck out the next three batters – the last of which, Micah Truax, is the two-time reigning Big East Player of the Year – on 11 pitches.

"I was glad she revved it up, she struck out the side, that was huge," Sortino said.

Samantha Salato had one of 11 singles for the Minutewomen in a 9-0 victory over UConn Thursday night at the UMass Softball Complex. A seven-run fourth inning broke the game open.

"We were fortunate that she got the leadoff hitter out, that was the Big East Player of the Year, and that kid can hit."

The Minutewomen will close out the regular season as they play the final four games of their Atlantic 10 schedule in the next three days. UMass hosts La Salle Friday at 3 p.m., and again on Saturday at noon and end the regular season with a doubleheader at home against Fordham starting Sunday at noon.

Saturday's game will be "Pack the Park" day as UMass tries to sell out the game as it honors this year's seniors and Sunday's game will be the second annual FanFest game.

After A-10 title, UMass focused on Metro League

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts rowing team will look to continue its success this season when it heads to Camden, N.J., Saturday to compete in the ECAC Metro League Championships.

The ECAC championship could potentially be the second-to-last race for the Minutewomen this season, as the only remaining event on the schedule is the momentous Dad Vail Regatta, an event that hosts over 100 schools in the country.

UMass coach Jim Dietz realizes his team's strong season is nearing its end.

"It comes by too quick. All year long you train for this and in six weeks, it's over," Dietz said.

However, with strong performances this week and next, his team could garner more attention from the NCAA selection committee and extend its season.

Unlike many other collegiate team sports, capturing a conference title does not guarantee a slot in the NCAA rowing championships. Dietz is looking for his team to record some top-three finishes this weekend and feels confident that they will be able to contend with the best teams in the east over the next two weeks.

"We're building a lot of confidence after winning the Atlantic 10 Championship last week and the girls are rowing really well," Dietz said.

The Varsity eight boat has been impressive all season as well. The boat is coming off a victory against MIT last weekend and has yet to lose in a regatta all season.

The boat had an impressive run of five consecutive ECAC championship victories, but came to a disappointing end last season, when they finished fourth in the race. Bucknell won the event. UMass' second Varsity eight performed well last year in their race, in which they were able to capture second place.

The race this weekend will feature several of the top rowing teams in the east. Among them will be Bucknell, which earned its fourth consecutive Patriot League rowing title last weekend.

Another quality opponent that will look to challenge the Minutewomen this weekend is Princeton. The Lady Tigers are ranked No. 6 in the nation, and have even been ranked as high as No. 2 overall this season. Princeton has maintained a 6-1 record in a very competitive Ivy League.

Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island will also participate in the event this weekend. The meeting marks the first time the two teams have squared off since the Minutewomen defeated the Lady Rams by a margin of 24 points in the A-10 championships.

The Cooper River, the site of this weekend's championships, is familiar water to the Minutewomen. UMass turned in a top-five finish in the Knecht Cup earlier in April there, and then followed that up with a first-place finish in the A-10 championship. Ironically, the river will also be the sight of the NCAA Championships the last weekend in May.

UMass' performance there this weekend may very well dictate whether or not the Minutewomen return there next weekend.

Campaign to cork Coke

Students prepare to boycott Coca-Cola over 'pouring rights'

By Hannah McGoldrick
Collegian Staff

Today, the "Campaign to Stop Killer Coke" at the University of Massachusetts will be holding a boycott against all Coca-Cola products.

The campaign at UMass is a nascent organization beginning to gain ground among students. Boone Shear, a member of the organization and an anthropology doctoral candidate at UMass, said "the boycott is meant as a symbolic beginning and as an informational, consciousness-raising exercise."

The student group is planning on contacting and having dialogue with University administrators and decision makers about the University's "exclusive pouring rights" contract with Coca-Cola, is eligible for renewal in August, according to the sponsorship agreement. Shear said the group hopes "to have representation and voice in the contract bidding process."

However, according to contract administrator Ruth Yanka, "the University exercised its option to renew the contract in February of this year," although the contract would not have been up for renewal until this August.

"We are aware that the University receives a significant amount of money from a company that is associated with torture, kidnapping, murder, union busting, draining of public groundwater in vulnerable communities and so on," said Shear.

The allegations Shear is referencing regard the grievances lobbied against the Coca-Cola Company in the 2001 lawsuit, Sinaltrainal v. Coca- Cola, placed against Coca-Cola in a Miami federal court. The suit charges that the company collaborated with Colombian paramilitaries to assassinate union leaders at one of the company's Colombian bottling plants. The charges were placed under the Alien Tort Claims Act, which states "a U.S. company can be sued in America for its actions abroad."

The lawsuit alleged that paramilitary forces killed three workers, who were members of Sinaltrainal, the National Union for Food Industry Workers, who worked in the Coca Cola Bebidas y Alimentos plant in Carepa, Colombia. In 2003, the charges were dismissed because a U.S. District Court determined that the allegations did not have substantial origin in the United States.

Area on watch for flu reports

Amherst College's Johnson Chapel. Nine Amherst students are exhibiting symptoms of swine flu, though not made official by the CDC.

5-College area investigating 10 students' mild symptoms

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

Two probable cases of swine flu at Amherst College were identified by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health (MDPH), and as of Sunday evening, an additional seven Amherst students and one Smith College student have tested positive for Type-A influenza, or the common flu.

The nine Amherst students are exhibiting mild symptoms which may be H1N1 (commonly known as swine flu) and are being treated as such, said Amherst College President Anthony Marx in a statement Friday.

The students' identities have not been released to maintain confidentiality, and they will be isolated for up to one week, said Amherst College spokeswoman Caroline Jenkins Hanna. All are being contained in the same dormitory room while they are monitored, treated and fed by Amherst College Health Services members. The dormitory in which the students are being housed has not been disclosed.

The Smith student, who was in close contact with one of the ill Amherst students, has been isolated with her own kitchen and bathroom facilities, said a statement on the college's website. Her classroom and residential contacts are being notified, and the MDPH is evaluating whether or not the young woman has swine flu.

None of the cases have been confirmed by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) yet, which may take one to two more days, Hanna said. If the students do have swine flu, they would be the first to contract the illness in western Massachusetts.

However, "none of the students' cases are considered serious, and all are responding well to treatment," said Marx. University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert C. Holub added that all of the students are "expected to recover fully" in a campus-wide e-mail Thursday night.

No cases have been identified at UMass, though surveillance is ongoing, said the chancellor's e-mail. All UMass campus activities are continuing as scheduled, based on advice from the MDPH and CDC.

"We have been meeting over the past week to determine what we would do if such and such occurred [at UMass]," said University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski on Friday. "There's been a lot of planning, a lot of thinking and a lot of what-if scenarios." Amherst College is taking precautions by cancelling a number of social gatherings, including all parties scheduled over the past weekend.

Attending classes is not considered "high-risk" behavior at this point.

UMass professor Sally Powers was recently awarded the Chancellor's Medal following her research on stress and hormones' effects on love.

UM prof looks into stress, relationships

By Kat Manser
Collegian Staff

Speaking to a full room on Monday afternoon at 4:00 p.m., University of Massachusetts psychology professor Sally Powers delivered a lecture called "Hormones and Lovers' Quarrels." The lecture was the culmination of the 2008-2009 Distinguished Faculty Lecture series.

After her talk, Powers was awarded the Chancellor's Medal, which is "the highest honor bestowed on individuals for exemplary and extraordinary service to the University," according to the award website.

Powers is a family researcher and the director of the Center for Research on Families at UMass Amherst. In Monday's lecture, she shared the results of her studies on stress' effects on depression, for example how, "conflicts with the people we love the most translate through the body in the form of stress, especially in adolescent females and women."

According to Powers, depression is the leading cause of disability worldwide, and the greatest

NCAAs await UMass teams

Men's and women's lax teams both headed to tournament

By Eli Rosenswaike and Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's lacrosse teams have proud traditions: the Minutemen have made 18 NCAA Tournaments, including a runner-up finish in 2006, while the Minutewomen captured the 1982 national championship and appeared in the semifinals in 1984.

Despite their respective successes, never have both teams made the NCAAs during the same season.

That ends in 2009 after both squads captured their respective conference tournaments to receive the automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament. And both teams will play schools with even prouder lacrosse traditions.

The Minutemen

Led by freshman goalkeeper Doc Schneider in 2006, UMass made it all the way to the NCAA title game before falling to Virginia. With such young talent, it was a surprise to many that they spent the next two postseasons watching.

Not this year. The Minutemen (9-5, 5-1 ECAC) will play at fourth-seeded Princeton (12-2, 5-1 Ivy League) on Sunday at 5 p.m., in a game televised on ESPNU. This will be the third-ever meeting between the teams, with the previous two also coming in the NCAA Tournament. The Tigers won in both 1995 (first round) and 1997 (quarterfinals).

"You work your tail off and sophomore year we had a bunch of one-goal losses and last year everything happened – we wanted to put the program back to where we thought it belongs," Schneider said Sunday night after the NCAA Selection Show.

"We wanted to make the tournament, we strived for that, but we're going down there to win."

If they do, they'll play the winner of fifth-seeded Cornell and Hofstra.

The Minutewomen

Behind a clutch 5-goal 3-assist performance by Jackie Lyons, UMass (11-7, 8-1 Atlantic 10) defeated Saint Joseph's, 15-14, in overtime in the A-10 Tournament to clinch the automatic qualifier.

However, the team endured some early losses to top competition that hurt their RPI. As a result, the Minutewomen will travel to Chicago to face four-time defending national champion and top-seeded Northwestern (19-0, 6-0 Atlantic League) in the opening round Sunday at 1 p.m.

It will be a tough task for the Minutewomen, who lost 22-5 at home to the Wildcats back on March 25. UMass has gone 8-1 since that loss and believes it is a different team than the one that lost by 17 goals nearly two months ago, and believe they can pull off the upset.

"We have the potential to shock a lot of people," senior captain Holly Drown said.

The winner of Sunday's game will go on to face the winner of Princeton vs. Georgetown.

Eli Rosenswaike and Scott Feldman can be reached at sports@dailycollegian.com

Powers delivers faculty lecture

mental health problem in the U.S. Powers shared that 16 percent of people will be affected by depression at some point in their lives, with women being two times more likely to be affected.

One aspect of Powers' study reviewed the depression rates of adolescents, defined by the study as people in their second decade of life. Powers discovered that depression rates in females in particular skyrocketed around puberty – she revealed this may be due to changing reactions from other people to the female's appearance, rapidly evolving brain chemistry or increased stressors that come with adolescence.

Powers then delved deeper into the last theory for female depression. She accounted for risk factors such as family and genetic history, early trauma, off-time puberty and environmental factors. She then focused on stress' effects on depression and its interaction with other factors, because the stress hormone cortisol can damage the dopamine system which "plays a critical part in our being able to feel reward and pleasure."

Powers studied three types of relationships: parent-adolescent, dating couple and newlywed relationships, specifically focusing on individuals' coping styles and differences related to gender. She videotaped partners in each type of relationship discussing a conflict important to them, then had both impartial observers and the people directly involved in the conflict rate what behaviors they witnessed, according to standardized judgments such as "giving in" or "sarcasm."

Another crucial aspect of her studies was to test the saliva of each partner, before, during and after the conflict to analyze it for hormones that are excreted when a person feels stressed or threatened.

When reviewing the parent-adolescent conflicts, Powers discovered that the males she studied were more likely to exhibit behaviors classified as "sarcasm" when "giving in." She commented that this allows the males to "withdraw from the conflict and protect themselves." The females exhibited a behavior she termed "engaged submission." She said the females would also give in, but they would do so whilst smiling and giggling in order to "protect the relationship and de-emphasize their own voices."

When studying the dating couples, the saliva analysis showed that males were actually more stressed during the anticipatory phase of the conflict rather than during, and that females were slower to recover their stress levels afterwards.

Powers said, "I believe parent-adolescent conflict situations are valuable because they provide experience for teenagers to practice voicing their points of view." However, she continued, "submission doesn't do a very good job of resolving the conflict that was an issue in the first place."

She explained that cortisol can remain in the system and lead to chronic stress and depression. These continually elevated cortisol levels have also been linked to "down regulation of the HPA system," which is responsible for the body's response to stress.

Several audience members reacted to the presentation, one asking if the researchers considered using same-sex couples. Powers explained that they were trying and that only a small sub-group was used for this particular study.

Another student brought up the point that the researchers should not forget that correlation does not prove causation, and other chemicals could be at play. Powers agreed, concluding that researchers are studying all the bio-psycho-social causes of depression.

Her conclusion is that the way people react to conflicts, often through submission, causes continued stress, and this stress can cause or worsen depression. It is one aspect of a very complicated issue, one that affects a significant part of the national and global population.

Student group set for boycott of Coke over 'pouring rights'

Under the company's insurance obligations in the Coca-Cola contract, the company is contractually obligated to "statutory workers' compensation, including employer's liability insurance, subject to limits of not less than $1,000,000, affording coverage under applicable workers' compensation law." However, there is no tangible evidence that this insurance clause was awarded to the murdered workers' family members.

The campaign at UMass said in a letter to the editor that "the corporate giant has chosen to evade responsibility and thwart investigations."

Despite these allegations, Ms. Yanka stated "the University cannot make a decision to exclude a vendor from the campus without some defendable basis."

The Coca-Cola Company receives "exclusive pouring rights" under its multimillion-dollar contract with UMass. Under the contract, the University is to "use its reasonable, good faith efforts to maximize the sales and distribution of products on the campus, including hawking products in stands and approved cups or twenty-ounce contour bottles during all events when any items of any make or description are hawked."

The University received up to 46 percent commission off of the sale of Coca-Cola products. The contract also states that "during the term, no competitive products of any kind whatsoever will be marketed, advertised, merchandised, promoted or sampled in any manner nor at any time on the campus and/or in connection with the University, the campus, or the University marks."

At the time of bidding in August 2004, Polar Beverages of Worcester, Mass., was the other bidder. However, under review by a seven-person selection committee, Coca-Cola was chosen based on established criteria. Since the University renewed the contract in February, "there are no renegotiations – the contract is extended under the same terms and conditions," said Ms. Yanka.

"The University has committed itself to a relationship with a corporation that is associated with human rights abuses and criminal acts. This relationship effectively excludes other businesses from selling competing products in most places on campus, thereby limiting student choice and compelling students to participate in this relationship. I think the onus is on the administration to figure out alternatives," said Shear.

The University receives benefits from the exclusive contract with Coca-Cola, such as the Chancellor's Merit Scholarship of $15,000, transferring the UCard debit program to an Ethernet-based infrastructure, renovations to dining hall beverage stations and a Bill Cosby event with a $10,000 cash sponsorship.

"The concrete benefits bestowed by this exclusive contract tacitly endorse, and indeed are a result of Coca-Cola's unresolved abuses," said the campaign. They also believe that it is unethical for the University to benefit from Coca-Cola's "criminal acts."

A petition has been circulating, distributed by Killer Coke at UMass, to rescind the "exclusive pouring rights" contract with the Coca-Cola Company. On whether the University took notice of the petition's circulation and what would occur if the University were to rescind the contract, Ms. Yanka said, "I have not seen any petitions, nor have I had any questions or concerns raised to me regarding ending Coke's contract for some time."

Killer Coke at UMass said, "as part of a global effort to force Coca-Cola to take responsibility for its actions – and to allow for free choice on our campus – we call for the University to rescind its current contract and to refrain from any future agreements."

5 colleges closely watch 10 students for swine flu virus

Hanna said. For now, all classes will run as normal, though the cancelling of classes is something that is being discussed daily. A cross-registration program through the Five Colleges, Inc., which includes UMass, Smith, Amherst, Mount Holyoke and Hampshire, allows approximately 4,500 students to enroll at one of the Five Colleges and take courses at any of the other four schools, according to the Five Colleges, Inc. website. However, Blagiuszewski said the preventative focus is more on students who live in close quarters with one another – like in a dorm – as opposed to students interacting in the classroom.

Amherst College athletes have been cleared for competition after being screened by medical health professionals, and will participate in scheduled athletic contests. Some club sports – including rugby – have been canceled. Activities that could potentially involve the sharing of food or cups will not take place.

On Thursday and continuing Friday, the College began installing instant hand-sanitizing stations across campus to supplement existing stations in the dining halls and fitness center. Informational posters from the CDC about proper sanitizing techniques are being hung around campus as well. The College is also asking students with cough and flu symptoms to report to health services, not attend classes, stay in their rooms and limit their visits to public places. The number of students who have visited health services has increased slightly over the past week, though no great increase has been observed since the possible swine flu cases were reported on Thursday, Hanna said.

"After consulting with state and other health officials, we have decided that the campus will continue to operate regularly, while we continue to closely monitor the situation," said Marx. A task force of representatives from Amherst College Health Services, the dean of students, dean of faculty, physical plant, public affairs, campus police and other offices have been assembled, met Friday morning and will continue to meet to assess the situation as it develops, Marx said.

"Although Dr. Morgan tells us that the flu cases treated thus far on campus have been relatively mild, and that the H1N1 flu strain is not believed to pose a significant threat to healthy adults, the College believes that these precautionary steps are necessary and appropriate," he said.

How the nine Amherst students contracted the illness is "kind of a mystery at this point," said Hanna, and the College's immediate focus is on treatment and prevention.

UMass seniors Nikki Woodward, a biochemistry major, and Mandy Lennox, a psychology major, said they are a little, but not overly, concerned about the potential illness hitting Amherst College, which is less than a mile and a half drive from UMass.

"It will affect me that if I feel sick, I'll start worrying about it more then because I'll think it could be [swine flu]," said Lennox. In the meantime, "I might wash my hands more," Woodward added. Sophomores Chris Reeves, a biochemistry major, and Cindy Hopf, an animal science major, also expressed mild concern.

"It might make me be more conscious about hand washing, but I don't think it's reason for me to freak out," said Reeves. "If [the spread] increases, then I'll worry more."

Anyone with symptoms, or anyone who recently has been in close contact with influenza, is asked to seek medical evaluation. Individuals with weak immune systems are recommended to get pre-emptive care.

Symptoms of swine flu can include fever, lethargy, lack of appetite and coughing. Some have also reported runny nose, sore throat, nausea, vomiting and diarrhea. Basic prevention measures include using soap and water or alcohol-based sanitizer often to clean hands, coughing or sneezing into a tissue, not sneezing into hands, disposing of used tissues, and keeping hands away from eyes, nose and mouth to reduce spreading germs. Those who experience symptoms are advised to stay home from school or work, and limit contact with others.

On Wednesday, The Boston Globe reported two brothers from Lowell, Mass. who contracted the state's first cases of swine flu after a recent vacation in Mexico allegedly exposed them to the illness. Massachusetts now has seven CDC-confirmed cases. On the same day, swine flu caused the first national death – a 22-month-old boy from Mexico being treated in Texas. Nationally, nearly 300 schools, 200 in Texas alone, were closed on Thursday to prevent the illness from spreading further.

The number of CDC-confirmed cases in the U.S. reached 226 on Sunday up 91 from Wednesday and appears to be growing, according to the Associated Press (AP). The World Health Organization raised the global alert level of swine flu from four to five out of a possible six on Wednesday. Level six is a pandemic.

Three hundred swine flu cases and 12 deaths due to the virus have been confirmed in Mexico after health officials have tested 679 people so far, said the AP. Mexican health officials had suspected around 170 deaths earlier in the week, but would only confirm 12 on Thursday.

No Congress in sports

Nick O'Malley

The Bowl Championship Series (BCS), the current method of selecting the champion of the Football Bowl Subdivision (FBS) of Division I college football, is the electoral college of college sports. It's an archaic, arbitrary and asinine system that the fossils of college athletics cling on to for tradition and college presidents defend for profits.

It's so ridiculous, in fact, that in an interview with ESPN during his presidential campaign, Barack Obama mentioned that he is against the system and would try to change it.

So, it is no big surprise, then, that on Friday, BCS officials were summoned to Washington to defend their current system against the waves of criticism, from both sports fans and politicians, that the system should be scrapped in favor of a traditional playoff format.

I'll be damned if we live in a world of subsidized sports. It's the one place where people can go to avoid all of the crap that comes with politics.

It was all reminiscent of when Major League Baseball was likewise called to the principal's office in the capital to explain itself in the light of steroid allegations. And much like that time, the BCS officials did a poor job of defending itself. We should, according to Rep. Joe Barton of Texas, "call it the 'BS' system."

This, however, is not the issue. Whether or not referring to two human polls and six computer polls is a good way to determine a championship game is a good system – and it isn't – is a moot point in the face of a much larger issue:

Why is Congress still snooping around our sports leagues?

Up until this point, it's been fine. Getting rid of steroids? Good, they're illegal. Changing a playoff system because, according to Barton, "it's like communism?" That's pushing it a little.

I mean, as a sports fan, I would be a big proponent of both of these changes. However, if Congress sets a precedent that they can waltz into a private sports league and bend it to their will, that's ridiculous.

"It's probably better than a 50 percent chance that if we don't see some action in the next two months of a voluntary switch to a playoff, you'll see this hill," Barton told BCS officials about a bill that would change the current system in college football, essentially telling them that, if they don't scrap the system, the government will do it for them.

I'll be damned if we live in a world of subsidized sports. It's the one place where people can go to avoid all of the crap that comes with politics.

First, they'll get rid of steroids, which is good for the kids. Then it's the BCS, which would be sweet. But, if this were to continue, there would be nothing to stop the government from swooping in and putting a salary cap in baseball, banning fights in hockey, making basketball players wear helmets or go youth soccer on us and say that everybody has to play.

What makes this an even more ridiculous issue is that the NCAA already has an effective playoff system in the Football Championship Subdivision (FCS), the division in which your Minutemen play.

College presidents and BCS officials, though, don't think that a pre-established, effective system is good enough for the FBS. They claim that the bowl games, like the storied Papajohns.com Bowl, are time-honored traditions that can't be lost and that "the regular season is the postseason." Wait, what?

Officials on the panel said that the current system in place for the FBS heavily favors schools that are in the bigger conferences, such as the Big 10, Southeastern Conference and even individual schools like the University of Notre Dame.

This is a good gesture by Congress to fix what is really a broken system. However, there is an institution that monitors college football, the National College Athletic Association (NCAA).

Normally, the NCAA would fix an issue like this. The issue, though, is who the system benefits. Because of the current system that has 34 "bowl games" to end the season, more schools get more money because of more nationally televised games. This benefits the college presidents, who have the ultimate decision with NCAA affairs.

Meanwhile, fans are screwed because the NCAA throws 34 postseason football games at them, only one of which is actually meaningful.

So, with no recourse, the government has to come in and fix the issue of an old, broken system that gives money to the larger, more successful, more influential schools in college sports. See the issue?

As much as this should happen, though, it just can't happen this way.

As soon as Congress gains the ability to manipulate sports, people are going to lose the traditions that made them love things like college football in the first place. All of this because of one really bad tradition that the hierarchy of college presidents will be worse off because of it.

This is a situation where the potential for change is so good, yet the implications down the road might make us miss the good ol' days where we had crappy sports systems.

Yeah, they might have been crappy systems. But they're our crappy systems.

Res Life needs a resurrection

I believe I was praying to Ra for a little more sun when I first heard of the new housing and residence life course being offered. Perhaps Ra mistook the one-credit, pass-or-fail class for a ray of light.

I am intrigued for two reasons.

Elie Feinstein

One: there is the option for me to apply to be the "co-instructor," or as I will, for the rest of this column, refer to as "the apprentice," a three-credit opportunity to instill in my younger, unenlightened brethren, "vision, mission and values."

Two: there is the option for me to write this editorial. For those of you who don't know which option I have decided to go with, this class may just be the very best decision you have made in your life.

I, personally, could not make myself roll out of bed every day if I knew it was to lead discussions on how to "foster a positive, welcoming environment on your floor community" or to brainstorm "some of the strategies that you might use."

All too often I get the sense that residence life is about keeping up appearances, asking questions for the sake of asking questions, with little regard for the answers. Other times, it seems like the Joker is breathing down my neck, growling, "Let me put a smile on that face."

But I am already smiling. And that's because it's all beginning to become clearer to me; the reason they are now offering this course. It's because that the class is now part of the resident assistant (RA)/apartment living advisor (ALA) application process.

The reason they want me to be their "apprentice" all boils down to this: Housing and Residence Life has no – and, I repeat, no – idea what leadership is.

Leadership isn't born out of some class, and it is most certainly not the result of receiving a "P" on your SPIRE account. It is not born out of stimulating discussion, either.

On the contrary, leadership is a combination of intuition and experience. As someone who has gone through RA training, I can tell you. The students selected as new RAs were exactly the same people on move-in day as they were during vacation, although slightly less tan.

Leadership isn't born out of some class, and it is most certainly not the result of receiving a "P" on your SPIRE account. It is not born out of stimulating discussion, either.

They were all different types of leaders: authoritative, diplomatic, task-oriented, goal-oriented, talkers, listeners and everything in between. But they all shared one thing in common. When asked which activity they enjoyed the most, their answer was as unanimous as it was resounding, "enter the RA."

Why was "enter the RA" so popular? Not only was it entertaining and a nice break from a long list of seminars and information sessions, but it was also the only interactive section of training. It was the only experience the fresh batch of RAs had with confronting real life problems.

So what is the benefit of taking this course? Essentially, there is none.

Of course, it is now a requirement for prospective RAs and ALAs, even if they are eventually rejected and at best placed in the alternate pool.

What residence life is trying to do is emulate the kind of education found in Commonwealth College's honors courses, or the department's Citizen Scholars Program.

But the discrepancy residence life fails to acknowledge is the difference in experience. Commonwealth College places an emphasis on applying knowledge to the real world. The Citizen Scholars Program requires students to reach out to the community; to choose an issue that deeply concerns them and to act on it and to become a proponent of change.

This course, however, does no such thing. It distances itself from students, rather than engaging with them. And, as a result, the assigned readings carry little weight. It instead advocates a superficial approach to building community, resting only on the hope that community will be built and that students will thrive on their own. But hope, Confucius reminds us, is as hollow as fear.

Perhaps it is a fear dwelling in the heart of housing and residence life that hinders it from pushing students out of their comfort zone, from making them really learn and transform into leaders. A fear that students are not children anymore, that the babysitting is over and the parents are miles away.

But then, why be afraid?

Judge the unborn as we judge ourselves

Eric Magazu

Last week, the student organization UMass Students for Life, a group of which I am a member, arranged flags in a display next to the Student Union. Each flag represented one million children that have been lost through abortions since the Supreme Court issued its opinion in the Roe v. Wade case in 1973.

Abortion is a subject that creates strong emotions on the entire spectrum of ideological opinion, although there is a wide swath of people who are indifferent on the matter. This amount of indifference would not be surprising in the case of most political issues, though it is somewhat telling in the case of abortion.

The issue is a serious one because it reveals much about the character of a society and a civilization. The way that a civilization treats its citizens shows much about what it holds most dear.

Western civilization in general – and America in particular – has transitioned itself into accepting a materialistic and self centered worldview that has become devoid of a shared code of ethics.

The ethical issues that are often raised tend to focus on material concerns. People will lobby government for cash bailouts to corporations or cash transfers to private individuals. These transfers from the taxpayers to other citizens do not result in any underlying change in the attitudes of the people. These transfers only sever the link between individuals and families.

In order for community to be built, there needs to be a genuine relationship among community members that will only result if people are truly dependent on each other in a significant way. This is not to say that we ought to have a communal takeover of the economy. Rather, we ought to get to the point where we care about neighbors so much that we want to ensure their wellbeing.

If we can choose life or death issues for someone else, then upon what grounds can we truly say that another person might not choose life or death for us?

This here is where we extend this understanding to the issue of the personhood of the unborn child. By placing an immeasurable value on human life at this early stage, we take a strong stance in favor of protecting our neighbors in distress. It strengthens the resolve of our communities to set firm boundaries on what can and cannot be considered permissible behavior.

The worth of all human life is not simply measured by how we treat the unborn, but the elderly, the sick and the disabled. These issues are all intimately connected. If an unborn child can be terminated at the choice of an adult human being, there is no reason that the quality of life of an elderly or disabled person cannot also be deemed not worthwhile enough to preserve.

We may even suggest that young infants are not in the category of those who are truly living. These assertions can lead to disastrous results if we do not act firm in setting the boundaries in defense of all life.

In one sense, all of humanity seeks something that gives worth to itself. But this worth can only come from outside of us.

We are all in the state of the unborn child, the elderly, the sick and the disabled. Our worth as measured by society is based entirely on our material accomplishments in this world.

These material accomplishments are fleeting. If we judge certain life to be not worth saving, then we are judging ourselves as well. If we can choose life or death issues for someone else, then upon what grounds can we truly say that another person might not choose life or death for us?

There are objections to this line of reasoning. Some will claim that sententiousness, the recognition of the world around us, is the prerequisite to having a claim to the protections of life. This line of argument presupposes that the only life worth saving is based on what self-satisfactory value it has for us.

Many argue that, if preserving the life of young human beings is important, then why not the life of other species, especially chimpanzees and bonobos? These are important concerns; however, simply because there is a deficiency in one area, does not invalidate the cause itself. There is also an inherent dignity in being human that is simply not shared with other species.

A similar argument is made concerning government services to the poor. It is posed as to why those in favor of life would not support massive services to poor mothers. This is an important concern, but it fails to account for the deeds of private individuals in this cause, and, again, this does not address the issue of life itself.

If we look at this matter away from our own personal self-interest and try to see things in the way that is ideal for our children and our communities, we will realize the necessity for laws protecting the unborn. It requires an extraordinary amount of sacrifice on our part, but we all must work together to resolve this divisive issue.

Bailey Sanders allowed four runs in the first inning in Sunday's Game 2 loss against Fordham in the regular season finale.

Rams play streak-breaker

Fifty-four game home win streak snapped by Fordham

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

The regular season for the Massachusetts softball team has been a time of streaks, records and moments to remember. But one certain streak ended in UMass' 5-4 loss to Fordham in the second game of their doubleheader on Sunday afternoon.

|---|---|
| Fordham | 5 |
| UMass | 4 |
| UMass | 4 |
| Fordham | 0 |

Before the loss, the Minutewomen had won 54 straight games at home, and had a 170-14-1 record at the UMass Softball Complex.

After Brandice Balschmiter pitched a one-hit gem in the day's earlier game at noon, coach Elaine Sortino opted to go with junior pitcher Bailey Sanders in Game 2.

Sanders' outing didn't go how Sortino planned at all. The junior had her worst outing of the year only lasting one inning, surrendering four runs and two home runs.

"Bailey has just been working on stuff and I figured I'd get her out there, get her some innings, but I didn't expect it to implode," Sortino said.

After Melissa Andrews sent a ball over the fence to put the Rams up 4-0, Sortino handed the ball to Sara Plourde. Plourde only lasted two batters, walking freshman Lindsey Kay Bright, then giving up a single to Mary Beth Puccio to drive in another run.

"The game got away quick," Sortino said.

Wasting no time, Sortino walked to the mound for the final time in the game, this time to remove her team's second pitcher and replace her with Balschmiter.

Balschmiter served as the perfect reliever in a time when her team needed her most. The senior struck out 11 over 6-2/3 innings pitched, while surrendering only two hits.

The Minutewomen (35-8, 16-2 Atlantic 10) managed to get back into the game, climbing back within reach of Fordham (36-20, 13-7 Atlantic 10) after every inning that went by.

"The good part of this game is that we did come back," Sortino said. "We could have rolled over and died. We were down 5-0 and we chipped away and chipped away."

UMass loaded the bases in the second and fifth innings, only manufacturing one run in those two frames. Jessica Serio walked with the bases loaded in the second inning to put the Minutewomen on the board.

"We had the opportunities with people on base – we left nine on base," Sortino said. "In order to come back, you have to put the ball in play. The pop-up and double-play with bases loaded is just not good softball."

Carly Normandin continued to pace the team atop the order, lining a single to right field in the third. The ball got by the right fielder Erin Fisher, letting Normandin scamper to third base. Whitney Williams followed Normandin, lifting the ball foul to left field. Normandin tagged up on third and beat Kay Bright's throw to the plate.

The Minutewomen were held without a run in the fourth and fifth inning but inched closer thanks again to Normandin. After Davina Hernandez led off the inning with a walk, Normandin sent a pitch from Fordham pitcher Jen Mineau, down the right field line and over the fence to pull UMass to within just one run.

After Balschmiter shut down the Rams again in the top half of the seventh, it was up to the bottom of UMass' lineup to create some offense.

Mineau managed to get the Minutewomen to go 1-2-3 with Kyllie Magill, grounding out to third base to end the game.

Earlier Sunday afternoon, UMass beat Fordham, 4-0, behind Balschmiter's 13 strike-out performance. Samantha Salato hit her 15th home run of the season – tying UMass' single-season record.

Despite her accomplishment, Salato didn't recognize it as anything special, and like Balschmiter has stated many times, the outcome of the team is more important to them.

The Minutewomen also played host to La Salle on Friday and Saturday afternoon. UMass won both by scores of 5-0 and 8-0, respectively. Highlighting the two games was Balschmiter's no-hitter on Friday afternoon.

Series sweep comes at right time

UMass takes 6th seed in Atlantic 10 standings

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team completed a three-game sweep of St. Bonaventure on Sunday with a 12-7 victory at Earl Lorden field, improving their standing in the race for an Atlantic 10 Tournament spot.

|---|---|
| UMass | 12 |
| SBU | 7 |
| UMass | 7 |
| SBU | 6 |
| UMass | 6 |
| SBU | 6 |

The series sweep currently positions the Minutemen (19-22, 11-10 A-10) into the sixth and final spot in the tournament bracket with six conference games remaining.

UMass was down 7-3 entering the bottom of the sixth inning but rallied with two runs in the sixth and six more in the seventh to claim just its second A-10 series sweep of the season. The Minutemen have won 10 of their last 13 games in the conference.

Faced with a deficit of four runs at the start of the seventh inning, the Minutemen knew they were running out of time to get ahead of the Bonnies (21-20, 7-13 A-10). Senior third baseman Sam Boone started the rally with a walk. Back-to-back singles by senior second baseman Adam Tempesta and junior center fielder Brian Baudinet scored Boone. Senior designated hitter Jim MacDonald then laid down a sacrifice bunt to advance the runners to second and third with only one out, and junior right fielder Mike Donato was intentionally walked to load the bases.

Junior first baseman Mike Gedman came through in the clutch with a bases-clearing double to right-center field to take the lead at 8-7. Relief pitcher Cory Sudbrook couldn't slow down the Minutemen, who tacked on three more runs.

Boone came up again in the seventh as the Minutemen batted around in the inning. With the bases loaded, he reached on a fielder's choice that scored Conley from third. The rally was finally concluded when Tempesta popped up to the shortstop, stranding runners on first and third. The rally gave the Minutemen an 11-7 lead.

Freshman catcher Tom Conley hit his first collegiate home run on a 1-0 pitch from Dennis Sherba in the sixth inning that precipitated the rally.

Sophomore reliever Charlie Benson relieved junior starter Jared Freni and shut down the Bonnies to ensure the victory. In five innings of relief, Benson gave up just three hits (all in a scoreless ninth inning) and allowed no with five strikeouts to earn the victory.

In four innings of work, Freni gave up six runs on eight hits and struck out five.

On Saturday afternoon, a pair of sophomores led the charge en route to a 7-6 win over the Bonnies. Catcher Corey Volpicelli went 2-for-3 with three RBIs in his first career start for the Minutemen and pitcher Nick Serino struck out eight, allowing three runs on nine hits in 5-1/3 innings pitched to earn the victory for UMass.

Volpicelli gave UMass the lead in the bottom of the third inning when he singled in two runs with the bases loaded. The rally started with back-to-back singles by senior designated hitter Jim MacDonald and junior right fielder Mike Donato, followed by an intentional walk of Matt Gedman.

Volpicelli hit a single up the middle on a 0-2 count to score both MacDonald and Donato. The hit put the Minuteman up 3-2 and they never looked back.

The game became nerve-wracking for the Minutemen in the top of the eighth when the Bonnies cut the UMass to one. After a single by freshman right fielder Ryan Skellie, the tying run from second was rounding third in hopes of tying the game at 7. Kyle Multner threw an absolute strike to catcher Volpicelli to tag out the potential tying run.

from Hawkins, the most athletic of the bunch as he has seen some playing time as wide receiver and on special teams. On Saturday, though, Hawkins showed off his arm rather than his legs, going 5-for-9 for 79 yards, a touchdown and an interception deep into the UMass secondary.

"He had a real good pass for the touchdown, a solid scrimmage I thought. Without looking at the tape, that's what I saw," Morris said. Havens had the most reps of any of the signal callers, going 4-for-11 for 63 yards. For Havens, the only newcomer in the midst of the quarterback battle, the focus is mostly on individual play and the hopes that the best quarterback will win.

"I try not to think about it too much. I just go out and play the best that I can. There are four other great quarterbacks; they're all good. So I'm just trying to do the best that I can and just see how it turns out," he said. "So whoever comes in, they're going to have their own style, their own play and I think whoever the starter ends up being, it'll work out fine."

Whipple tallied two scores for the offense, one through the air and one on the ground, performing well when he was placed into a redzone situation. Wallace, meanwhile, capped off his day when he hooked up with a tight end in the corner of the endzone for his lone score of the day.

"We're really going to get a frontrunner in the fall," Morris said of the QB situation. "This spring was about getting guys out there, letting them run around, get a feel for the offense, get a feel for leading the offense.

"Liam Coen, over the last four years, he's the only one who has led the offense. This wasn't about trying to find the guy. This spring was about trying to let guys find themselves and find their role in the offense."

od started. He became a virtual brick wall, making 12 straight saves as UMass stormed back with a 5-0 run off its own to take a 6-5 lead early in the third quarter.

"I had to focus in a little bit more, maybe stop running the defense as much, but we settled down. I think everyone was just trying to make a home-run play defensively and offensively," Schneider said. "I wasn't playing well and kind of put us in a bit of a hole so I just slowed down; I've started every game since I've been here so I just [had to play] like it was a normal game."

After a first half that saw both teams trading big runs, the second half evolved in a nip-and-tuck battle as neither team ever led by more than one goal after halftime.

Connolly (35 goals, five assists this season) scored two of his three goals after halftime, including an amazing individual effort on his second goal that tied the game at 7-7.

Blanketed by three Scarlet Knights, Connolly somehow managed a shot from behind his back that slipped by Rutgers goalkeeper Peter Pantages.

"That was just Jimmy being Jimmy," Balise said. "He comes up with some of the most ridiculous shots. He's got an awesome stick; he had a few goals today that I don't even know where he shot it from."

Bobby Hayes, Rory Pedrick and Art Kell all scored one goal apiece for the Minutemen.

Saturday's win marked a complete turnaround from last season, when the Minutemen stumbled to a 5-9 record after eight players were suspended because of an off-the-field incident.

UMass will return to the NCAA Tournament for the first time since 2006, when the Minutemen lost in the championship game to Virginia.

Game notes

The score at halftime was 5-5. Nine different players scored a goal in the first half…UMass tallied assists on just two of its 11 goals…The score was tied at 6-6, 7-7, 8-8, 9-9 and 10-10 at various points in the second half… Eight of the 10 Rutgers goals were scored by players who came off the bench.

Cannella the ultimate leader

above it, he always shows his emotions like us," said star goalkeeper Doc Schneider. "He's great and you want to win for him when it comes down to it. He's the absolute trademark of what a coach should be."

It was also a meaningful moment for Connolly, who endears the man that gave him another chance to play at the school that he loves.

"Coach Cannella is a great guy. He cares a lot about this team and a lot about this program," Connolly said. "He's also an emotional guy and when big events like this happen, you can't blame him when he shows his emotions."

Led by Cannella's spectacular group of seniors, it seemed as if that big event was inevitable all season. After an inconsistent beginning to the year, with impressive victories followed by close losses, the Minutemen won their first four ECAC games to jump out in front of a very talented conference.

But after a disappointing home loss to Georgetown on April 18, UMass suddenly found itself behind Loyola – a team it beat on the road three weeks earlier – in the conference standings with just two ECAC games remaining.

Led by Connolly, Balise, Schneider and the steady leadership of Cannella, the Minutemen never wavered. Not after the loss to the Hoyas and not after rival Syracuse knocked their teeth just days after a key road win over Fairfield.

So when his team entered overtime against Rutgers on Saturday afternoon with the entire season on the line, Cannella was confident his team would gut out the victory.

Much of what they worked so hard for would have ended had Rutgers scored that goal: the ECAC crown, the NCAA Tournament berth.

But UMass doesn't have to worry about that scenario. When Balise scored that goal and his team went crazy, it was hard for Cannella not to get emotional.

"I saw it go in and before I turned around, the whole bench was past me. It's fantastic [to see]. These guys work so hard," said Cannella, fighting back tears.

As Cannella walked towards the bus with so much in hand, he passed the trophy to someone else because he couldn't hold it anymore.

He's carried the program for so long, forgive him if his arms needed the rest.

New UMass quarterback Kyle Havens is competing with four others to become the starting QB in Amherst during the 2009 season.

UM football making strides

Quarterback competition key to team's progression in 2009

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

There were referees, screaming coaches, cameras and a semblance of fans in the stands. Yet, the Massachusetts football team's spring football game on Saturday couldn't substitute for the kickoff of a new season for the Minutemen, as UMass and UMass finished with a 0-0 "tie."

The team scrimmage, played between the white (offense) and maroon (defense) teams, placed the Minutemen in a number of game situations as the team wrapped up spring practice with a quasi-game, giving fans a glimpse of next season.

For new UMass coach Kevin Morris and his players, though, the game presented a chance for members of the team to step up and show how far they have progressed over the off-season.

"We've come a long way," quarterback Scott Woodward said. "At the beginning of the spring, we couldn't line up, we couldn't do anything right. Now we put it all together today and it came out pretty well."

Morris praised the performances of redshirt freshman center Quentin Sales as well as All-American senior tackle Vladimir Ducasse. Middle linebacker Tyler Holmes also stood out for Morris, making up for the absence of senior linebacker Josh Jennings, who did not dress for the game.

UMass Football

The biggest performance of the day, though, came from redshirt junior wide receiver Aaron Fears, who scored two touchdowns from 17 and 19 yards out. He also recorded what ended up as the biggest play of the day, a 38-yard reception that kick-started an 80-yard scoring drive.

Jonathan Hernandez also had a big showing behind incumbent starting halfback Tony Nelson, accumulating 42 yards on four carries. Hernandez was also the beneficiary of solid run blocking from the first-team offensive line that features two freshmen and a first-year transfer.

SPRING QUARTERBACK BATTLE

With the departure of the school's all-time leading passer Liam Coen, the Minutemen and Morris have a big decision on their plate for this off-season: Who will replace one of the greatest passers in the program's history?

The daunting task is not lost in the team's suitors for the position: Woodward, junior transfer Kyle Havens and redshirt sophomores Octavious Hawkins, Spencer Whipple and Scott Wallace are all contenders.

"You can't fill Liam [Coen]'s shoes," said Woodward, who has served as Coen's backup over the last three seasons. "He's the best quarterback who's ever walked on this field, and all I can do is learn from the past three years from being his backup."

"It's a huge void in leadership. But we have other seniors that are stepping up," Havens, a transfer from Diablo Valley College in California, said. "Whoever comes in, they're not going to replace him. No one's going to be Liam. We're all different quarterbacks."

Out of all of the potential candidates, Woodward has the most in-game experience. Over his three years as a backup, Woodward is 26-for-50 on passing attempts for 291 yards and two interceptions. The other candidates have combined for 2-for-4 passing for 28 yards, two catches for 26 yards and one tackle.

The catches and tackles come

A return to prominence

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team celebrates while posing for a picture after Saturday afternoon's thrilling 11-10 overtime victory over Rutgers, which gave the Minutemen the ECAC Championship and an automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament. UMass last appeared in the NCAAs in 2006, when it made a run all the way to the national championship game before falling to Virginia.

Overtime thriller gives UMass ECAC title, NCAA berth

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — After 60 minutes of momentum swings, violent hits and back-and-forth action, the game is tied, and the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's entire season comes down to sudden-death overtime.

A goal clinches the Eastern College Athletic Conference regular season title and an automatic berth into the NCAA Tournament. Surrender a goal, and their season is likely over. With so much on the line, UMass turned to its team captain.

|---|---|
| Rutgers | 10 |

Tim Balise scored his fifth goal of the game in overtime against Rutgers to lead the Minutemen to an 11-10 victory over Rutgers Saturday in Piscataway, N.J. UMass also received standout performances from goalkeeper Doc Schneider (19 saves) and attacker Jim Connolly, who scored three goals.

But after the thrilling overtime win, it was all about Balise.

"Mr. everything Tim Balise, the 4.0 [GPA], [his] five goals today and the game-winner," said Connolly. "Timmy and Doc are two of the hardest working kids I know and they deserve every award and accolade they get."

Balise scored the game-winner moments after a game-saving stop on a point-blank shot by Schneider. The ball was quickly cleared up the field and Balise scored on a jumping bounce-shot with 2 minutes, 30 seconds left in overtime to seal the win and the ECAC Championship.

"We told our guys they were going to be in a battle for 60 minutes, it wound up being 62," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "So we knew what we were in for. Rutgers played their tails off today."

Connolly's third goal nearly put the game away in regulation. With the Minutemen (9-5, 6-1 ECAC) tied, 9-9, with 2:30 left in the game, he found himself isolated with a defender standing between him and the net. He jumped above the defenseman and rocketed a shot into the net to give UMass a 10-9 lead.

The lead didn't last long as Rutgers attacker Gerhard Buehning scored his team-high fourth goal to knot the score at 10 with 1:35 left in regulation.

The game went into overtime after both teams missed golden opportunities to put the game away. First, an errant pass by the Scarlet Knights (4-11, 2-5 ECAC) squandered a 4-on-2 breakaway with 1:10 on the clock. One minute later, UMass midfielder Evan Blum managed an open shot in front off the net, but it clanged off the post and bounced to midfield right before time expired.

Balise may not have gotten the opportunity to score a game-winner without the play of Schneider, who leads the NCAA in save percentage at .658.

He had a difficult start to the contest, allowing five goals in the first period on six shots on goal as the Scarlet Knights made a 5-0 run after UMass took an early 1-0 lead.

Schneider's performance picked up dramatically once the second peri-

Cannella is the perfect leader for men's lacrosse program

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — Wielding a big, heavy and shiny trophy in his right arm and assorted belongings in his left, Greg Cannella couldn't shake the hands of all the well-wishers after the game.

Good problem to have.

The 15-year coach of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was carrying the 2009 ECAC Championship trophy that his team won, earned and deserved just 20 minutes earlier and 15 months following an incident that rocked the team and resulted in eight players getting dismissed from the squad.

Eli Rosenswaike

Winning the conference championship was a moment of redemption for two of those players: Jim Connolly and Ryan Marcus, who were the only ones of the eight that were reinstated for the 2009 season. And it was clearly a special moment for Cannella, who is UMass' leader, a man of class and a coach that embodies how a successful college program should be run.

"I just can't say enough about the leadership, the seniors, the captains and some of the younger guys that have stepped up to be leaders," said an emotional Cannella after the game. "In that sense, we turned around the culture of the team from last year from the incident. And to me, that is the most important [thing], obviously."

Credit that to Cannella. Just ask former UMass star Sean Morris (2003-2006), and he'll tell you.

"Because of his ability to work within the University and what he stands for, they have a great coach and somebody that not only is out to coach a kid in lacrosse, but also help coach them in life," Morris said.

"It's that family atmosphere that is the UMass lacrosse program. For him to have the program go so low and have this black eye, and to now persevere in a way that making that tournament was such a big, big statement," he added. "And that comes back to coach Cannella."

When Tim Balise scored the game-winning goal in overtime against Rutgers to give the Minutemen the ECAC crown and automatic qualifier into the NCAA Tournament, all the players converged onto the field in a massive celebration. When the trophy was presented after the hysteria, a still-energized UMass team posed for a photo with the hardware, while Cannella and his assistant coaches looked on.

Maybe Cannella wanted his team to have a moment of their own. But he belonged in that picture. He is that team; he is UMass men's lacrosse. You won't find anyone that would argue that.

"We hugged each other, we started crying – best feeling I've had in a while. He loves it just as much. He's not

Swine flu possible at Mt. Holyoke

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

Over the weekend, four additional Amherst College students tested positive for Type A influenza and one Mount Holyoke College student contracted a flu-like illness causing all five students to be isolated on their respective campuses.

With 13 at Amherst, and one at both Mount Holyoke and Smith colleges, 15 Five College students have been isolated out of precaution for flu-like symptoms, which could be swine flu. None of the cases have been confirmed as testing positive for H1N1 (commonly known as swine flu) by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), though two at Amherst were identified as probable by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health (MDPH).

The Mount Holyoke student does not appear to have any connection to the cases at Amherst, but she has been isolated in a self-contained apartment adjacent to the college's campus, said a statement released Tuesday from the school's director of Health Services Karen Engell.

Despite Amherst College's total reaching 13 possible swine flu cases, the school's director of Health Services Warren H. Morgan said in a statement released Monday afternoon that the level of influenza activity on campus had remained stable and none of the cases had been severe.

Six of the previously quarantined Amherst students were released today as the seven-day isolation period ended and the students had recovered. One of those released spent eight days in isolation instead of seven because they were one of two students who had been considered probable for swine flu by the MDPH.

The University of Massachusetts and Hampshire College have not had any suspected swine flu cases.

Monday evening the MDPH released a statement confirming 28 additional swine flu cases in the state bringing the total to 34.

Among the newly confirmed cases, were two Hampshire County residents, ages 19 and 20. Whether the two Hampshire County cases were the same ones being monitored at Amherst, Smith or Mount Holyoke could not be confirmed by the MDPH because of patient confidentiality, said Jennifer Manley, the department's spokeswoman.

The two confirmed swine flu cases in Hampshire County are the first in western Massachusetts.

The increase in the number of confirmed cases is the result of confirmatory testing now being done at the William A. Hinton State Laboratory Institute in Boston. Previously, testing of all suspect cases was performed at the CDC in Atlanta, Ga., which resulted in a backlog of samples for testing.

Each of the new cases is expected to fully recover and none of the cases are hospitalized, the MDPH statement said.

According to the CDC's website, 1,085 cases of swine flu have been confirmed in 21 countries and killed 25 people, including one death out of 286 cases in the United States across 36 states as of Monday.

Symptoms of swine flu can include fever, lethargy, lack of appetite and coughing. Some have also reported runny nose, sore throat, nausea, vomiting and diarrhea.

However, "in many cases 'flu-like' symptoms are being confused by students with seasonal allergy symptoms: running nose, scratchy throat, no fever," Engell said.

Basic prevention measures include using soap and water or alcohol-based sanitizer often to clean hands, coughing or sneezing into a tissue, not sneezing into hands, disposing of used tissues, and keeping hands away from eyes, nose and mouth to reduce spreading germs. Those who experience symptoms are advised to stay home from school or work, and limit contact with others.

Rep. club hosts Adams

By Emily Reynolds
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday night, the University of Massachusetts Republican Club hosted conservative writer and teacher Mike Adams for his talk, entitled, "I Had an Abortion; The Hypocrisy of Roe v. Wade."

Adams spoke to an auditorium filled with students, half of whom were there protesting the controversial figure. Some yelled at the stage or held signs that read, "Women's Bodies, Women's Choice," and "It's My Choice Mike Adams."

"I think Mike Adams is able to present a perspective that is not often heard on this campus," said Republican Club president Derek Khanna. "This gives UMass the opportunity to hear the other side of the argument."

The talk was centered around events that Adams has attended and stood for as well as events having to do with pro-life and pro-choice groups that have had problems surrounding them in the past. Adams spent much of his speech using examples of why pro-life groups should have the ability to talk more often without being met by protestors.

"You can't have a hunch of people screaming over others and claim freedom of speech," said Adams. "There is a First Amendment right to freedom of association."

Adams spoke at length about discrimination against pro-choice people based on their political views.

Adams provided examples of pro-life discrimination by using his own study that he had done informally. According to Adams, out of a dozen Women's Centers that he called, each with about 10 employees, there were no pro-life employees represented.

"The people who work with the pro-life movement are virtually non-existent in women's groups," said Adams.

Adams also talked about how pro-choice groups claim to be open-minded, but refuse to hear the other side of an argument.

An example that he used was about a female student who attended Spokane Falls Community College in Washington state. On an anniversary of Roe v. Wade, the student wanted to have a protest against abortion and was told by the administration that she could not.

Conservative writer and teacher Mike Adams visited UMass to discuss his views in abortion.

He said the administration went on to say that Washington was a pro-choice state and, therefore, so she couldn't hold the protest. He also said since Roe v. Wade, the country has become pro-choice.

"In the wake of Roe v. Wade, people have become very confused," said Adams. "You suddenly have the right to privacy, which is nowhere in the Constitution, but what the decision is based on. It also means in pro-choice America, the other side can't speak."

He did admit that there were some groups that gave a bad name to pro-life groups. However, he added that the same can be said of pro-choice groups.

"I'm dead set opposed to the Genocide Awareness Project," said Adams. "There are people holding up pictures of dead babies with the intent to hurt to make you feel bad, and to make you feel guilty."

Instead of making people feel bad, Adams said he believes the two sides should start a dialogue

'Herb Fest' at UMass held in lieu of final

By Adrienne Wickham-Gobert
Collegian Correspondent

As an alternative final project, students at the University of Massachusetts are putting together HerbFest, as a chance for a public showcase of the herbal knowledge gained in the class "Herbs, Plants, and Medicinal Spices" each year.

HerbFest will be held Tuesday, May 5, from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom, and is held by UMass professor and botanist Lyle Craker and his students.

The "Herbs, Spices, and Medicinal Plants" class teaches the various culinary and medical uses of herbs, in addition to covering the different elements of botany, history of herb trade, business potential, agricultural value and the biological chemical components of plants. The showcase will consist of informational booths presenting diverse types of herbal salves, tinctures, decoctions and remedies. It will count as a full exam grade for the students.

UMass student and sustainable food systems major Tim West is putting on a display that highlights the different uses of aphrodisiacs.

"There's many medicinal herbs and spices that have aphrodisiac qualities to them. I'll be presenting different elixirs and concoctions to illustrate this," said West.

Distinctive types of plants in his booth will include damiana, saffron, maca root, ginger, and sandalwood.

Another UMass student Greg Lemoine will discuss oils that can he used topically, ingested through culinary means or taken as a supplement. His portion of the showcase will display coconut oils and tamanu oils that help psoriasis and healing small cuts, amongst other things.

Some booths may even have edible components.

"There's no doubt that the edible elements are going to be the highlight at HerbFest," said student Mollie Murnane, who will present New England edibles at the event.

In the past, HerbFests have been largely successful.

"I'm so excited for HerbFest. Not only am I energized to show off my exhibit about foraging in New England, but I'm eager to see the final projects of my fellow students," added Murnane.

CAMPUS PERSPECTIVES

What do you have to say about this issue?

Recently, Amherst College, Smith College and Mt. Holyoke have reported that some of their students may have the strains of H1N1 influenza A, also known as swine flu. How do you feel about this illness while living at UMass?

Nursing major

"I guess I am a little afraid of getting it, but there has only been one dead infant in the U.S. In my nursing class, we learned there is no treatment for it, but we are in such high alert that if a person sneezes they automatically have the swine flu. It's sort of turning into a joke. Or maybe people are joking because they are scared. I'm not afraid of dying from it, but people should take extra precautions anyway. College is a germ fest – think of beer pong. It's the worst idea ever."

–Roxy Murillo

Political Science major

"Based on what I've been following, it doesn't seem particularly dangerous in the U.S. However, I am not taking any chances. I carry Purel everywhere, I drink a carton of orange juice every week, and I am constantly LYSOLing every surface around me."

–Sean Canty

History major

"I'm concerned, but I'm not so concerned that I feel I need to miss class. I pretty much wash my hands all the time anyway. I'll probably survice if I get it. It's weird that Boston doesn't have the swine flu; but UMass is a cesspool of disease and it's bound to come on campus. We should change the capital of Massachusetts to Amherst."

–Steve Coffey

Biology major

"I know that the swine flu is really hard to get rid of because it is so new that our bodies do not know how to fight it. But I guess I'm going against my better judgment and trying not to freak outbecause I feel we have better medications than Mexico does. Plus, as far as I can tell, people are doing a good job quarantining those with the disease. Maybe I'll freak when it comes to UMass."

Students react to Adams' talk

Some of the students, especially the people there to protest, disagreed entirely with the presentation and found his answers to some of their questions less than satisfactory.

"I believe in a woman's right to choose, it's fine either way," said UMass freshman Amanda Schultz. "But a lot of people speaking for the pro-choice side have their ideas skewed. There isn't enough of a voice for those who have been raped and who need the option of a choice."

While Adams' speech focused on the pro-life movement, it was not what a lot of people expected.

"I was expecting him to talk about more biological things, but he focused more on laws and examples from different campuses," said UMass freshman Shelby Heilig. "It was a different kind of speech, and I really appreciated it."

Schultz also thought that other topics would be talked about but ended up not being covered.

"I assumed he would address Plan B and condom use," said Schultz.

The speech ended with a mixed reaction between some members of the audience cheering for Adams and others chanting against him. Adams pointed out that they could protest because were fortunate enough to have been born,unlike aborted fetuses.

The talk had close to 10 police officers in attendance, as two years ago when Adams spoke on campus, he was taken off the stage.

"Last time he spoke, the protestors took over the stage and attempted to take over the speech," said Khanna of the past incident. "We believe strongly in the right to free speech, but we don't believe in silencing other speech."

There was little interruption in Adams' speech overall, with the exception of two protestors, who were taken out of the auditorium for heckling the speaker, and several audience members commenting after a few of the things that Adams brought up in his speech.

The speech was given in support of the Students for Life "Pro-Life Week."

A visit to New Orleans

UMass Hillel sponsors 2009 alternate spring break trip

By Dinah Gorelik
Collegian Staff

While many college students headed off to relax in the Caribbean sun, a group of 18 students and two staff members from the University of Massachusetts went on an "alternative spring break" to New Orleans to rebuild homes damaged by Hurricane Katrina, which struck the United States in August 2005.

The trip was offered by the UMass Hillel and funded by the United Jewish Communities, Hillel International and money acquired during the 2nd Annual "Ride to Provide" Charity Bike Ride last October.

Furthermore, Hillel International and Habitat for Humanity decided on the project that the students would be working on.

While in New Orleans, the students stayed at Camp Hope, which is run by Habitat for Humanity.

Over the course of the week, students rebuilt a fence, worked on a house that was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina and scraped paint off the siding.

"At the camp, we met and got to talk to a lot of people who have been volunteering there for weeks, even months. We were the largest group of a little over 200 students that week, with kids from many different Hillel's across the country, which was also another cool thing, being able to meet Jewish students from all over the U.S. that all came to this one place for the same purpose," said Karen Sokolow, a participant on the trip.

Prior to the trip, students attended several educational sessions to prepare.

"In the educational sessions, we discussed the impact of Hurricane Katrina on our own lives as well as covering a little bit of history and culture of the city of New Orleans. At the conclusion of the trip, the last day in New Orleans, we gathered as a campus group to discuss what the trip meant to us, to share our thoughts with each other and how we would bring the message and experience of the trip back to our community," said Ben Ring, a staff leader for the trip.

According to the Habitat for Humanity's website, its mission "is to build houses in partnership with sponsors, volunteers, communities and homeowner families, whereby families are empowered to transform their own lives, and to eliminate poverty housing in the New Orleans area while serving as a catalyst to make decent shelter a matter of conscience and action.

"I think the trip had a profound impact on the students," continued Ring.

"Students came back from the trip so energized and really interested in doing something about the problems in New Orleans. I also think that the students bonded and connected so well with each other, and it was really great to see people become so close over the course of a week."

Funding for alternative spring breaks such as the community service trip to New Orleans is raised through events sponsored by the UMass Hillel.

One such event is "Ride to Provide," which takes place in September. "Ride to Provide" is a bike ride charity event, and money raised during this event benefits the alternative spring break program in particular.

"I learned that groups going down and volunteering really do make a huge difference and if it weren't for people like us, the city would not be in the decent shape that it is in today," said Sokolow.

"The most important thing I learned was that it's important to go back and share your experiences with family and friends and just inform people on what is going on down there," she said.

"Already five years have passed, so it is not one of the biggest issues on people's minds and many may think that the rebuilding is almost done, which is why they don't think to still go down there and volunteer. However, that is not the case at all."

Tray-less to pay less

Michael Phillis

Americans have a history of overconsumption, especially when it comes to food.

With the elimination of trays at all dining commons next fall, University of Massachusetts Dining Services has come up with a practical solution to cut costs. UMass Chancellor Robert C. Holub just announced $10 million in cuts next year. It's clear every department and organization on campus will have to tighten their belts.

Removing trays from the DCs will cut down on food waste, water usage and electricity. Simply put, if students have to walk back and forth to carry each new plate, they are inclined to take only what they will actually eat.

In terms of revenue, UMass runs the third-largest dining services in the country. Dining Services is completely self-sustaining.

This means that student fees and tuition money do not go to the DCs. Dining Services is solely in charge of creating and maintaining their own revenue streams.

Ken Toong wants to "put the [savings] back into the food." Recently Mr. Toong was named National Food Service Director of the Year by FoodService Directors magazine. Toong has proven himself to be an excellent leader and innovator for UMass.

Removing trays is the most recent example of one of his decisions to improve UMass.

"No one but [UMass] and UC Berkley have an organic salad bar," boasted Toong. During our interview he made a point of talking up his efforts to buy organic and locally grown food while stressing the importance of an overall higher quality product for the students. He is looking to use the saved funds to further enhance these goals.

In the interest of full disclosure, I work at one of the DCs on campus. I was hired this past semester and after looking around for campus work with no luck, I went to the Worcester DC and was given a job on the spot. The money isn't great but the paychecks have supplied me with a critical weekly stipend of money to pay for the regular college necessities.

If the DCs were not making an effort to save money, they would be forced to either raise the cost of meal plans or lower food quality or lay off employees. From what I can see, Dining Services is doing its best to avoid sacrifices in order to balance its budget.

Food costs are also not helping – everything seems to be getting dramatically more expensive. According to The Wall Street Journal, the price of corn has risen from its decade-long price of around $3 a bushel up to $7 in the span of just two years.

The paper recorded that wheat has gone through a similar increase, and that meat prices will be much higher as time progresses. The U.S. Department of Agriculture summed up the problem by predicting a 5 percent increase in overall food prices for 2009.

Toong has looked at his budget and realized quickly that something must be done to counteract these rising costs. What better solution, with such little student sacrifice could you hope for than simply forgoing our DC trays.

A slice out of local economy

[illegible] has amazing pizza. For such a [illegible] stand someplace other than the street. [illegible] a beacon of delicious, innovative pizza [illegible] creations. Even if Antonio's isn't your particular cup of tea – or slice of pizza as the case may be –surely you've patronized one of the many other pizza joints from Amherst like Pioneer Valley or [illegible].

[illegible] with such a diversity of local options, did the town of Amherst allow Papa Gino's to come and set up shop across the street from Antonio's? It turns out Amherst doesn't have all the much say in the matter. The building, which is leasing the space to Papa Gino's, is owned by D'Angelo Real Estate Inc. This means that the town of Amherst has no [illegible] over who gets to lease – that decision is up to the owners of the property.

So it continues then passes to the owners of the property D'Angelo Real Estate. Why another chain? Amherst, as well as Northampton and the Valley as a whole, prides itself on supporting local businesses. This is a blatant contradiction to its stated beliefs. Were there no local entrepreneurs who were interested in the space? Were they deemed unworthy?

The answer, most probably, is money. Renting the space to anyone, even a chain, is more profitable than leaving it empty. But it is also a short-sighted decision undermining the integrity of the local economy.

People tend to buy from chains because they are cheaper. Chains with corporate financing are able to offer promotional deals, sales and generally price their items lower than independent businesses. However, the money you spend at a chain ends up being less valuable to the local, regional and, ultimately, national economy.

Simply, locally owned businesses help a town or regional economy more than a chain. This is known as the Multiplier Effect. The Multiplier Effect says that a dollar spent at a local store will stay in the local economy longer. If you spend $1 at Fresh Side or Bruno's or Antonio's, that dollar has a good chance of being spent at another local shop, say A.J. Hastings, where it may be used at the farmers' market and then may make its way to Amherst Cinema.

Keeping a dollar local has benefits for all, including more part-time employment, more economic diversity and an overall healthier and more stable economy.

That same dollar helps keep three or four business going all the while putting employees who will put money back into the economy. Of course somewhere along the line that money will most likely end up at a chain, probably a grocery store or a pharmacy – or that new Papa Gino's.

These are known as "leaks." When you spend money at a chain a small amount goes back to pay the wages of the staff, but most of it immediately leaves the area, going elsewhere to where the chain is headquartered.

Keeping a dollar local has benefits for all, including more part-time employment, more economic diversity and an overall healthier and more stable economy. Strong local economies help to provide the foundation for a strong national one.

The difference in bed economies much more than large chains. If you have been hit by chains, they have a large cooperation to fall back on. If an individual corporate outlet is pulling in only a mediocre amount of consistency, a chain can wait it out. If a small local business experiences a slowdown, they risk being forced to close. For many small business owners, their store is their only income and they depend entirely on it for subsistence. Depriving local stores of patronage deprives a local supply of income.

With all these reasons to support independent business I can't see the reason for stores like Subway, Starbucks and now Papa Gino's on North Pleasant even when there are so many local options that are not only equally accessible but generally of better quality.

Why should brand name companies be given the best real estate when places like Rao's, Amherst Coffee and the Loose Goose Café be relegated to side streets?

Why does Amherst have so little control over what gets to be in its downtown?

What's the point in traveling to different regions of the country if it all looks the same, smells the same and tastes the same? Every town, city and region has something unique to offer. Amherst's downtown should reflect Amherst – not wherever those places are headquartered.

The Valley for all its talk and bumper sticker support of "buy local" has a pretty poor record for allowing chains to come into its downtown centers.

If Amherst Town Hall can't, or won't, restrict chains residents of Amherst should take action into their own hands and start boycotting stores that hurt the area's indigenous businesses.

As for us college students and the vast market force that we are, we should give a show of loyalty to Antonio's by refusing to spend our money on the same generic chain pizza we can get anywhere.

NATURALLY, CONSERVATIVES OPPOSE OBAMA'S SUPREME COURT APPOINTMENT.

Don't bail on government bailouts

Subhan Tariq

Over the past [illegible] months we've heard a lot about the government bailout.

People have gone down on both sides for and against it and don't truly understand where we stand on what to do.

People have complained that government bailouts don't work and that we should not be helping financial institutions that got us into this mess to start with. Others argue that without these bailouts the economy would fall into a deeper, darker hole.

Let's take a look at the bailouts and how it's been carried out.

Let's begin by saying that no plan is perfect and no plan is perfect. We all have our faults and we'd like to think the bailout has its flaws and many of us has made a lot of mistakes. These bailouts have helped keep millions in their jobs.

Thousands [illegible] who worked at financial institutions that did nothing wrong were at risk of losing their jobs, and if the government did not do anything, they would have lost their jobs, furthering the impact of this recession.

The consequences for doing nothing outweighed the reasons to do it, and now the government has a lot to gain. The government decided to buy a larger stake in Citigroup in March when the price of the stock was about $1.

At the close of the market on Monday, shares of Citigroup were at $3.20.

The fact is that we the people are helping out other people to prevent mass chaos. We the taxpayers have helped avoid disaster and helped keep millions of people employed.

That's more than a 300 percent increase in price over the past few months. That means if the government bought $300 billion worth of stock in March, the government is now making more than $600 billion in profit. With the government's deficit and the national debt skyrocketing, it is money that can come in handy not only for the government but also for the taxpayers who are paying for these bailouts.

The fact is that we the people are helping out other people to prevent mass chaos. We the taxpayers have helped avoid disaster and helped keep millions of people employed.

The consequences both financially and to our country would have been catastrophically worse. By millions losing their jobs, our country would have been propelled into a deeper recession that would have lasted years and cost trillions of more dollars.

I will be the first to agree that parts of the bailout haven't worked and should be reformed to better suit the public. For example, executives of companies who received the most bailout money should have been replaced for better management and should have been made to pay fines.

The fact is that companies still have the executives that led them into this mess and they should be replaced by more competent leadership. Our tax dollars are being poured into companies – like Citigroup, amongst others – and we should have a say as shareholders in how the companies are run. These executives aren't doing their job and they should be replaced.

Trillions of our tax dollars are being put into companies with the possibility of the government making trillions in profit. Money is also being poured into infrastructure development. There are thousands of miles of trains and roads that need to be upgraded, which in itself has the ability to grow millions of jobs. Also, there is a complete infrastructure development to provide high-speed Internet and energy-efficient facilities across the country.

Ultimately, what will get lost in everything going on is that millions of people still have their jobs and millions more jobs have been created. The bailouts have gotten the effects they have wanted. Since the last bailout, the stock market has gone back up and home sales are back up slightly. In the long run this bailout has the ability to pay for itself, let's just hope for the sake of the country that that happens.

Sex and phallic goods

Sex on The Lawn to be held Wednesday

By Barbara Booras
Collegian Staff

There are few events on campus that stir up the student body quite like Sex on The Lawn. This Wednesday, Vox: Students for Choice is hosting its fourth annual celebration.

"Vox is a pro-choice organization allied with Planned Parenthood Federation for America," said treasurer Christina Magnani.

Magnani and other members of the Registered Student Organization (RSO) promote sexual health and reproductive rights on campus through various outreach activities.

According to Planned Parenthood's website their organization focuses on "women's health and well-being, based on respect for each individual's right to make informed, independent decisions about sex, health and family planning."

Sex on The Lawn is Vox's biggest event and it continues to evolve and grow each year. The main goal of the event is to spread awareness and education on important sexuality-related issues in a fun and interactive way.

Vox is the same RSO that has brought other provocative events to campus like the "Vagina Monologues" and last semester's female sexual pleasure workshop titled Get Wet. Megan Andelloux, certified sexuality educator and the featured guest speaker at Get Wet, will also be participating in Sex on the Lawn sharing her valuable advice with students on how to combine sexual health with mind-blowing pleasure. Some additional services that Andelloux professionally offers are sex coaching, private and public workshops and curriculum development for sex educators.

This sexy celebration starts at 10 a.m. Wednesday on the library lawn directly in front of the Student Union. Students needn't be surprised to see balloons shaped like breasts, tables vending phallic baked goods and the ever-popular vaginal coloring book pages. For a small donation, spectators can frost and decorate their very own penis shaped cookie.

The EveryWoman and Stonewall centers will provide information about their services during the event along with other UMass programs. Event organizers are happy to provide students with informational brochures, dental dams, condoms and lubricants free of cost.

UMass Ballroom Dancers will be showing of their skills and support by performing throughout the day. Music and munchies will accompany the daylong festivities. Plan on dropping by with some friends to test your Twister talent, sex trivia knowledge or to bust open the mammoth penis piñata.

"The objective of Sex on the Lawn is to educate the community on reproductive health and rights in a fun and comfortable environment," said Magnani. "We want students to have a great time tomorrow and we hope to shed some light on some very prevalent issues."

Sensory overload at the FAC

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

Stepping into the Fine Arts Center's Curtain Theater for the University of Massachusetts Theater Department's production of "… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" on Friday night was a sensory overload.

Bright, almost neon paintings covered every wall of the theater, both engaging and warning at once, as if to say: "This is not a play for the faint of heart."

Paintings by artist Garland Harwell and theater students depicted things like "tator pie," "big feet" and "pot o' grits," assimilating spectators to the down-home language of Louisiana.

Old kitchen implements cluttered on one wall, TV-like screens showing images of clouds hung from the ceiling and the floor was painted in a colorful mosaic.

The drumming jam session that opened the show was jarring, with the booming bass drum and the rattling snare, but the actors' energy was infectious as they danced around the stage, banging on cowbells, tambourines, pots and pans.

"… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" uses many innovative techniques. In the more emotionally charged scenes actors call out from offstage, singing, moaning, playing an instrument like the wood block or fife or calling out responses to the action. The enclosed square space of the Curtain Theater allows for these calls to come from all sides, to the point where it's almost an overstimulation of the senses trying to hear and see everything going on.

However, unlike many contemporary productions, director Gilbert McCauley gets it right in "… And Jesus Moonwalks," and keeps the offstage calls from becoming a distraction and hindering the play's action.

In Miss Ssippi's opening scene, for example, the calls feel instead like the interjections of Southern Baptist churchgoers, giving emphasis to Miss Ssippi's artfully spoken words.

As the "quilter" of the story, Miss Ssippi (the Mississippi River) wore a voluminous skirt of various articles of clothing quilted together: a man's button-up shirt, a woman's apron and a plain ol' T-shirt. Her costuming was gorgeous, as the train of her skirt – which represented the river and was also quilted together from many fabrics – echoed the bright colors of the set design.

The play's tale of grief is striking, as Demeter Damascus searches for her daughter Po'em, and playwright and UMass faculty member Marcus Gardley poses the difficult questions of what it means to be truly free in a combination of elegant poetry and prose.

Yet even in such a tragic story, Gardley adds humor, with lines like, "It's like being ugly but goin' around thinking you pretty and got one tooth to your name," and exchanges such as, "Who you talking with?" "Jesus. He say hi.""

Gardley's production played with this humor, incorporating funny touches like the tiny lampshades protruding from the bust of Cadence Verse's corset and making Jesus' halo, robes and sneakers glow.

The play doesn't try too hard to be touching nor does it try too hard to be funny – instead, "… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" feels real.

The actors wonderfully captured this realness, not falling too hard into character archetypes and instead showing the range of emotions and capabilities present in each character. That is not to say they were inconsistent. Dawn Monique Williams maintained her attitude as Miss Ssippi, Frances Damond her innocence as Free, Mary Fegreus her spunky grit as Blanche and Dioh Brunner gave Damascus/Demeter great fortitude.

For the production, actors trying out were required to sing a following in addition to preparing a monologue, which was appropriate considering how prevalent the spiritual was throughout "… And Jesus Moonwalks." The work done with these spirituals was evident because the singing in the production was strong.

The only disappointment was the actual moonwalking. While Rondale Davis was as strong as the other actors, playing Jesus with grace and humor, his moonwalk was not up to the standards set by the title of "… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi."

"… And Jesus Moonwalks on the Mississippi" continues this week with performances Mai 5-9 at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center's Curtain Theater.

Diverse array of musical elements

Studio Orchestra and Jazz 1 blend their talents in concert

By Dave Mansfield
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Studio Orchestra and Jazz Ensemble 1, under the direction of professor Jeff Holmes, joined forces last Thursday night at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall to create unique and exciting music.

The combined ensemble, featuring the entire cast of Jazz 1 and the majority of the Orchestra, displayed their diverse repertoire by playing many of their students' arrangements and original compositions.

They began the evening with senior Mike Keough's arrangement of "Africa," by David Paich.

This provided a powerful opening statement that set the tone for the rest of the concert. The ensemble's brass section got a chance to show off its best stuff during this number, playing rich and triumphant melodies over a steady but eclectic percussion section.

The first half continued with the ballad "Mishkin," an original by graduate student and guitarist Lex Olsen.

The piece began with slightly dissonant, flowing melodies before settling into a laidback duple meter, very characteristic of big band ballads. Although there was no vocalist, graduate student Tobias Thomas played a very lyrical soprano sax solo that was fitting for the piece.

The ensemble then shifted gears, playing graduate student Alex Lee Clark's "Palomitas," a unique Latin sounding number. Clark implemented several unique elements, including syncopated clapping by the ensemble members and the combination of a baritone sax and a guitar playing the melody.

"You Should be You", an original by graduate student Adam Bosse, featured himself as the guitar soloist over a slow, free flowing string accompaniment. A gradual build in volume and timbre helped the piece reach its apex, before it came back down to its conclusion.

The ensemble continued to keep us on our toes with grad student Marek Novotny's "Moravian Memories," featuring Lindsey Graves as the guest vocalist. This piece incorporated a wide variety of instruments, ranging from xylophones to timpanis to strings playing highly accented, staccato accompaniments.

Graduate student Peter Van Siclen offered the audience a heartfelt tribute to his dog with his composition "Zinc."

This string arrangement featured lavish consonant harmonies and a blend of both legato and staccato playing.

The second part of Van Siclen's composition, entitled "Global House Warming Party," incorporated cheery, upbeat melodies on top of a combination of Latin and rock beats.

The second half of the show featured Jazz Ensemble 1 without the aid of the Studio Orchestra. It opened up with "The Interloper," a classic Thad Jones number featuring Bass as guest conductor.

This old-school big band chart featured a big, powerful, brass arrangement. Berhani Waldu on tenor saxophone and Walther Grenadier took turns showing off their virtuosity during the solo section.

The set continued with "A Child is Born," another Thad Jones chart arranged by Alex Lee Clark. Guest vocalist Nick Borges wowed the crowd with his powerful, expressive vocals over upbeat snare drum riffs and the bass trombone stylings of Dave Skelly.

The band brought the house down with grad student trombonist Brian Thomas' arrangement of Fred Wesley's "Damn Right I'm Somebody."

This chart featured a bass- heavy funk groove and a high, piercing brass sound. Thomas flexed his chops on this number, as did Matt Schumer on tenor sax and Ted Sullivan on drum set.

"Lester Jumps About," an original by senior saxophonist Tom Frink, opened with an almost gospel- like flavor.

A diverse array of musical elements were employed in this chart, including chromatics and a walking bass line. Several soloists were featured, including Thomas on trombone, Frink on alto sax, Josh Hurton on trumpet and Rick Cavallaro on bari sax.

The show concluded with a medley of the classic musical "West Side Story."

This popular Leonard Bernstein arrangement seemed to be an appropriate ending to a highly entertaining show where many of the student musicians were able to premier their original works.

During intermission, professor Holmes was presented with the Lifetime Achievement Award by the Massachusetts Association of Jazz Educators.

Holmes has had a decorated career as a performer, composer, director and teacher. He has taught jazz at UMass since 1979.

Jazz Ensemble 1 received numerous awards at the 2009 Villanova Collegiate Jazz Festival during March. It received honors for Best Big Band, Best Sax Section, Best Rhythm Section and Best Soloist for Brian Thomas on trombone.

Journey for the senses

Mogawi performed Saturday at Pearl Street in Northampton

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – Earth-shattering post rockers Mogwai performed their instrumental fare for a packed house at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton last Saturday.

The Scottish quintet has kept busy this year touring the world in promotion of its latest album, "The Hawk is Howling." April marked the beginning of its North American tour, making waves with its heavily instrumental sound all across the nation.

Opening the show were fellow Scotsmen The Twilight Sad. Taking cues from the elaborately tiered instrumentation of Mogwai, they combined lashing guitars with the thick Scottish drawl of frontman James Graham.

The band lived up to its reputation for hard hitting, yet highly melodic tunes that verge on the post-rock categorization. The band has made a name for itself performing its unconventional yet poignant rock with such acts as the Pixies, Smashing Pumpkins and Snow Patrol.

Mogwai's best know song, "Cold Days From the Birdhouse," off of 2007's "Fourteen Autumns and Fifteen Winters" struck a nerve with the post-rock crowd, beginning with instrumental reflection and building to anthemic proportions.

The five-man band performed a fitting intro to one of its greatest musical influences.

Purveying a noticeably more polished sound, Mogwai took the Pearl Street stage to an uproar that rivaled the volume of its music.

The band opened with "Yes! I am a Long Way From Home" from its 1997 debut, "Young Team." The song served to quietly introduce the band's fascination with variations on structure and dynamics.

"I'm Jim Morrison, I'm Dead," one of the more popular songs from "The Hawk is Howling," was next on the set list. The haunting keyboard melodies from the fingers of Barry Burns serve as the foundation for fuzzy guitar riffs that seem to multiply exponentially as the song progresses.

The merch booth even served up tees with Morrison's mug and the message "I'm Dead" for fans of the new tune.

While the band itself is not the most captivating of performers, its sound speaks for itself. The addition of aurora borealis-like lighting effects made for what one concertgoer called, "a complete audio-visual experience."

One did not have to take in the lighting or catch a glimpse of the band to grasp of their technical prowess, however. Each song was performed with the passion and precision of Mogwai's recorded work.

Fan-favorite "Auto Rock" kicked off with Burns drilling sparse melodies to the timely support of Martin Bulloch on drums.

One constant throughout the show was Mogwai's persistently close attention to dynamics. As evident on the band's recorded work, it plays heavily on the contrast created between ambience and uproar.

Songs such as "Like Herod" were not for the weak of heart, punishing unwary listeners with explosions of sound bursting forth from near silence. The song was brilliantly performed, though verged on unbearable decibel levels at times.

"Batcat," another new tune off "The Hawk is Howling," practically brought down the walls of the nightclub with ferociously loud guitar components.

During the encore, Braithwaite broke out the vocoder, an analysis synthesis system, and performed "Hunted by a Freak" off of "Happy Songs For Happy People." Undistinguishable lyrics melt into the majestic guitar soundscape, making for an ethereal experience.

Performing 13 songs, including the two-song encore, the set clocked in at a little more than an hour.

The only complaint to be had was from the sheer exposure to such solid blocks of sound for an extended period of time. Even so, the consistency with which the band was able to turn out these overwhelming tunes was something to be admired.

Standing before the virtuosic performers was the musical equivalent of staring down the solid rock face of a mountain, both a terrifying and awe-inspiring experience at the same time.

Mogwai's music is something of a journey for the senses. As a listener, it is easy to get lost in their hypnotically rhythmic sound. It comes as no surprise that the band is cited as one of post rock's biggest influences.

UMass stumbles at A-10 Championships

Minutemen finish in 11th place, Minutewomen 6th

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's track and field team continued its Atlantic 10 Championship struggles, finishing 10th out of 11 teams in Charlotte. The women's team wound up in the middle of the pack, with a sixth-place finish.

The top performance for UMass came from sophomore Daniel Schwartz, who finished third in the decathlon with 5,883 points. He took third in both the 400-meter run (51.02 seconds) and the 1,500 meter run (4:33.83).

Fellow sophomore Chris Dzidek also gave a strong performance in the decathlon, ranking seventh with 5,426 points. Dzidek finished first in the 110-meter hurdles (16.00) and second in the pole vault (12 feet, 10.50 inches).

The Minutemen distance runners continued their strong season with several solid performances in the 10,000 meters and 5,000 meters.

Kevin Johnson took eighth in the 10,000 meters with a time of 31:05.31, while junior Andrew McCann (31:28.21) and sophomore David Johnson (31:29.54) finished 11th and 12th, respectively.

In the 5,000 meters, the Minutemen notched eighth, 10th and 11th place finishes. Junior Jonathan Pierce finished eighth with a time of 15:04.24, while Nicolai Naranjo finished 10th (15:10.15) and Andrew Mulvaney came in 11th (15:22.36).

In the field events, Sean Busch had the top performance for the Minutemen,finishing third in the pole vault with a height of 14-03.25. Junior Brian Miller also gave a strong effort with his fourth-place finish in the high jump (6-06.25).

Freshman David McKenna and junior Chris Vercollone also had top 10 finishes. Both finished ninth in their respective events, with McKenna recording a distance of 140-11 in the discus and Vercollone a mark of 176-02 in the javelin.

For the Minutewomen, junior Lisa Wilson was once again the team's standout performer. On Day 1 Wilson captured the first A-10 Championship of her career with a first-place finish in the discus (155-00). She also took sixth place in the hammer (170-11) and capped of her weekend by finishing second in the shot put (44-08.75).

UMass also had a strong showing in the pole vault, with the Minutewomen grabbing two of the top three spots. Senior Kristen Bakanowski came in second place with a vault of 11-11.75, while junior Molly Chapin finished one place and one foot behind her (10-11.75). Chapin's mark was the best of her career and ranks third all-time at UMass.

On the track, all three relay teams posted top 10 finishes. In the 4x100, the team of Ida Okkonen, Holly Heinricher, Ros Murphy and Alex Haller finished ninth with a time of 49.73. Heinricher then teamed with Brittany Bakanowski, Claire Pettit and Deanna Julian to take fifth in the 4x400 (3:53.12). In the final women's relay, Gina Perno, Elizabeth Fisk, Lauren Stocker and Pettit finished 10th in the 4x800 with a time of 9:15.40.

Heinricher and Brittany Bakanowski were also the top performers for the Minutewomen in the individual events. Both notched fifth-place finishes, with Heinricher posting a mark of 24-76 in the 200-meter dash and Bakanowski finishing the 400-meter hurdles with a time of 1:04.03.

The UMass track and field teams return to action at home on Friday for the New England Championships.

this week and we got to make sure that we knock it off."

Key three

Considering UMass was the only team from the ECAC to make the NCAA Tournament, it doesn't come as much of a surprise that it had the top two goal scorers (Jim Connolly and Tim Halisiel and the top-ranked goalkeeper (Schneider) in the conference.

Connolly led the ECAC in goals with 35 and Balise tied for second with Loyola's Cooper MacDonnell with 30. Schneider's goals-against average (7.31) easily paced the conference and his .658 save percentage ranked second in the country behind Notre Dame's Scott Rodgers (.663).

All three players played a major role in UMass' 11-10 overtime victory against Rutgers that clinched the ECAC title.

Balise led the Minutemen with five goals including the game-winning goal in overtime. Connolly had a hat trick and scored UMass' final goal in regulation.

Schneider made 19 total saves including 12 saves in a row from the start of the second quarter to help UMass overcome an early 5-1 deficit.

Eli Rosenwaike can be reached at erosenwa@dailycollegian.com

Jim Connolly's 35 goals have been a huge part of the Minutemen's dramatic improvement over last year's 5-9 season.

W LACROSSE from page 8

double-overtime loss to Duquesne on April 17. Still, UMass coach Alexis Venechanos feels that her team faced long odds throughout the season, so another challenge is nothing new.

"We've been underdogs this entire season, even going into the A-10 Tournament no one expected us to win," Venechanos said. "I think this was exactly what we want, the committee put us at the lowest seed possible, and I know that we are capable of great things."

Lyons pace

Jackie Lyons' outstanding 13-point performance in the A-10 Tournament not only helped catapult the Minutewomen into the NCAA Tournament, but it earned her recognition as the A-10 Tournament Most Valuable Player.

That weekend also put Lyons within striking distance of the single-season record for points scored at UMass. She has 70 points (44 goals, 26 assists) four points shy of the record set by Whitney Thayer back in 1981.

To break the record she will have to score five points against the Wildcats. Lyons notched two assists last time the Minutewomen played Northwestern, but couldn't score any goals. That game came much earlier in the season, and Lyons has improved greatly since then, scoring 46 points over the past nine games.

Scoring punch

Lyons is not the only threat that Northwestern will have to worry about. Three other Minutewomen have scored more than 30 goals this season for the Minutewomen, Reddy is second on the team with 33, including a hat trick against Northwestern while Haley Smith (32) and Drown (30) round out the group.

The foursome has accounted for 68 percent of UMass' record-setting 204 goals scored this season, which broke the previous record of 201.

Lucky seven?

A seven-goal deficit can seem insurmountable to some teams, but not for the Minutewomen. Twice in the past three games, UMass has fallen behind by seven goals and managed to win.

First, the team overcame an 11-4 deficit at St. Bonaventure in the final game of the regular season on April 19 to win 14-13. In the A-10 Championship game, UMass found itself trailing 10-3 before storming back to win 15-14 in overtime.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu

Haley Smith is one of four Minutewomen who have scored 30 or more goals this season to help lead UMass' record-setting offense. UMass has scored 204 goals this year breaking the previous single season record of 201.

Minutemen fueled by hype

Talk of underdog role only feeding Schneider, UMass' fury

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Playing on the road in the NCAA Tournament against a higher-seeded team doesn't exactly seem advantageous. But could it be for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team at Princeton on Sunday?

The Minutemen certainly seem to think so.

"The underdog factor is the reason why we're all here. None of us were really highly recruited kids, we play to prove someihing every time we're out there coach [Greg] Cannella always harps on that," senior goalkeeper Doc Schneider said.

"We're going to a hostile environment against a team with one of the best lacrosse traditions in the country," he added "There's not much of a bigger underdog role you could ask for so we're excited about it."

As for playing away from the comforts of Garber Field and against a team that is undefeated at home, Cannella thinks that could be a good thing for his team.

"We're probably better off, in my opinion, going on the road," Cannella said. "You get away from campus here, we're able to probably keep our focus a little bit better – obviously it's a nice time of year here on campus and the campus comes alive there's a lot going on."

The Minutemen (9-5, 6-1 Eastern College Athletic Conference) finished the regular season with a 5-2 record on the road, which was better than their 4-3 mark in Amherst. UMass' most imporiani win of the season came at Loyola on March 21, a victory that gave the Minutemen the tiebreaker for the ECAC championship and the automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament.

The Tigers topped Brown (ranked No. 12 in the nation), Dartmouth, Harvard (No. 19), Syracuse (No. 1), Albany, Manhattan and Canisius at home this season without a loss. They also defeated No. 7 Johns Hopkins and No. 9 UMBC on the road.

MISSION STATEMENT

As a freshman goalkeeper in 2006, Schneider helped lead the Minutemen to the national championship game. But the success didn't carry over in either 2007 or 2008, when UMass went a combined 12-16 without a postseason appearance.

"You work your tail off and sophomore year we had a bunch of one-goal losses and last year everything happened ... " Schneider said. "We wanted to put the program back to where we thought it belongs."

But just because the Minutemen are back, doesn't mean they are satisfied.

"We wanted to make the tournament – we strived for that – but we're going down there to win," Schneider said.

No matter how his team does against Princeton, Cannella is proud of what his team has achieved just 15 months after an off-campus incident resulted in the dismissal of eight players before the 2008 season started.

"I feel good that they were able to accomplish one of the goals that they set forth this year, and that's to bring the program back," Cannella said. "And whether we won or not [Saturday against Rutgers], I thought they accomplished that goal a long time ago.

"But we did win and now we got to move on," he said.

According to the UMass coach, the first step in doing that is making sure his team wants more.

"[The season is already a success], but I hate to say [it] you don't want to tell them that either," Cannella said. "You really want to focus on the game coming up. A lot of people will be patting the guys on the back

Ready to face the challenge

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

At 10 p.m. on Sunday at the Hangar on University Drive in Amherst, the anticipation was palpable as members of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team looked on anxiously at the NCAA selection show to find out who they would face in the first round of the 2009 NCAA Tournament.

When the announcement came that they must travel to Chicago for a rematch with No. 1 ranked four-time defending champion Northwestern, who the Minutewomen lost to, 22-7, at home on March 25, the team had mixed reactions Some players were excited for the challenge, while others were somewhat surprised at their seed in the tournament

"I was a little shocked, I mean we didn't know who we were going to be facing," senior Meghan Reddy said Sunday after the official bracket came out. "I thought we were going to have a little higher seed, than we did."

"I mean no matter what we knew we were going to have a challenge," said senior captain Holly Drown. "So I guess [we drew] the biggest challenge we can get, but I think we're all up for it."

Technically, only the top eight teams actually receive seeding, but UMass in essence earned a "16th" seed because they will face off against the top seeded Wildcats.

The Minutewomen (11-7, 8-1 Atlantic 10) won the A-10 Tournament to earn the automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament, but evidently the selection committee felt that their early performance against out-of-conference opponents warranted a low selection.

UMass started off the season 3-6 overall, and went 1-4 against teams ranked in the top 20, with the lone win coming against then-No. 13 Dartmouth in a 13-10 decision, but it dropped to No. 16 and did not make the NCAA Tournament. The team's early struggles may have played a factor in the Minutewomen's tournament placement.

It is a tough break for UMass, which finished the season 8-1, with the only loss being a 15-14

Crew comes home with mixed results

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN

Heading into the Eastern College Athletic Conference Metro League Championships on Saturday, Massachusetts rowing coach Jim Dietz knew his squad had to face challenges that they had not faced all season.

Battling Princeton and Bucknell, the two top rowing teams in the nation, was not going to be easy and racing for the seventh-consecutive weekend would eventually have its effects on his team.

Dietz described the performance on Saturday as one filled with mixed results.

"In this sport it is difficult to peak every weekend," said Dietz. "People's legs were just tired."

Against 12 other Division I programs, the Minutewomen recorded top five finishes in several of their races. The Varsity Eight boat finished fifth in the Grand Final with a time of 6:51.9.

The Second Varsity Eight boat captured fourth place in its race by recording a time of 7:10.12. Princeton, the No. 1 rowing team in the region emerged as victorious in each of those races.

The Minutewomen's Junior Varsity Eight boat also placed in fourth.

However, the fresh legs of the underclassmen were a bright spot this weekend as the Novice Eight remained highly competitive in its race. The boat finished fourth in its Grand final, 13 seconds behind first-place Bucknell.

"The freshmen did a really good job this weekend" Dietz said.

Illness may have impacted some of the Minutewomen's performances on Saturday.

"A bunch of girls had some type of stomach virus," Dietz said.

This unprecedented season of sickness affected more than just UMass, as Delaware pulled out of the championships because several cases of the flu were found on its campus.

The Minutewomen will look to peak in the Dad Vail Regatta next weekend in Philadelphia. The regatta will host more than 100 schools from across the country, including Buffalo and A-10 rival Saint Joseph's.

The event will also host schools from California to Canada. The Minutewomen will have two days of practice this week in Amherst, before leaving to Philadelphia on Thursday. The team will look to work on its speed, but rest is equally as important. Dietz thinks his team will have a rebound performance next weekend.

"I think the girls will want to come back with a vengeance," Dietz said.

Rams, Flyers race for title

UMass will take on Atlantic 10 leader Rhode Island in three games this weekend. URI hold's a half-game lead over the Dayton in the A-10.

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As the regular season of Atlantic 10 baseball closes out its final two weeks of play, it will see two teams battle for the conference title. For Rhode Island and Dayton, the race is on.

Rhode Island (32-15-1, 17-3 A-10) has a slight advantage as it clings to a one-game lead over the Flyers.

Prior to its series against Fordham, URI senior shortstop Dan Rhault was named to the watch list for the Brooks Wallace Award, which honors the country's top shortstop. Rhault holds the triple crown for Rhode Island, leading the team in batting average, home runs and RBIs. With 49 RBIs, he is just 11 away from tying the Rhode Island single-season record.

Rhault and the Rams then hosted Fordham in a three-game series, winning two of three.

The Rams earned a close victory with a late rally in the rubber match on Sunday. With two outs and the bases loaded in the bottom of the 12th, freshman Milan Adams singled to third to score Tom Coulombe, lifting the Rams to a 7-6 victory.

Rhode Island will next travel to Massachusetts to face the Minutemen (19-22, 11-10 A-10) in a three-game series beginning at 3 p.m. on Friday.

Dayton (16-4, A-10/31-14, overall) is in the midst of an 12-game win streak after sweeping duquesne.

After winning 16 of its previous 17 games, Dayton has climbed its way up the A-10 standings and now sits half a game behind the Rams. The Flyers will have a chance to overtake the Rams with a strong showing in their next conference series at home against La Salle (18-24, 7-13 A-10).

CHARLOTTE RISING

After winning its last four conference series behind a batch of late-game comebacks, Charlotte's place as a top contender in the A-10 is becoming more convincing by the day. The two-time defending A-10 champions most recently staged comeback wins to open its series against La Salle. On Sunday, however, the 49ers' bid for their third-straight comeback win and series sweep fell short. Despite scoring four runs in the bottom of the ninth, Charlotte still lost, 8-7, to the Explorers.

Charlotte (28-17, 12-9 A-10) next hosts St. Joseph's for a three-game set beginning Friday.

SLUMPING SLU

After winning the A-10 Championship in 2006, St. Louis (24-24, 8-12 A-10) finds itself at the bottom of the standings.

On Saturday, the Billikens closed out a series win over George Washington after winning the second game of a doubleheader, 7-3. The win keeps St. Louis within striking distance for a spot in the A-10 Championships.

Frat reclaims old turf

As of June 1, the house at 118 Sunset Ave. will once again be home to Alpha Tau Gamma after a two-year suspension. Current residents Alpha Epsilon Pi will likely have to live in the dorms or off campus.

Alpha Tau Gamma to move back to Sunset Ave.

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a two-year suspension and a year of rebuilding its membership, a fraternity chapter at the University of Massachusetts will move back into its former house at 118 Sunset Ave.

Alpha Tau Gamma (ATG), the fraternity associated with the UMass Stockbridge School of Agriculture, has tried to get its old domain back since 2005, when it was suspended for a house fire, health and other building code violations.

The house's current residents are the brothers of Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi), who started renting from the house's owners, Alpha Tau Gamma's parent organization, Alpha Tau Gamma Inc. in June 2005. AEPi, an international Jewish fraternity, will leave when its lease is up, said Michael Wiseman, UMass' fraternity and sorority director.

The brothers of ATG will re-occupy the house June 1, according to its website, AlphaTauGamma.org.

Wiseman said ATG is allowed to re-establish itself and move into its old building because it has fulfilled the terms of its suspension. He also said AEPi will likely not have their own house next year and that its members must decide to live in dormitories or off-campus apartments.

There are not enough houses to accommodate all the fraternities and sororities at UMass; only 12 of the school's 37 Greek chapters have houses, he told The Daily Hampshire Gazette in Northampton.

The Gazette reported that ATG's neighbors on Sunset Avenue were unsuccessful last summer when they tried to talk town and University officials into removing the fraternity. Neighbors also made two attempts since 2003 to buy the house and remove the fraternity themselves. These plans were nixed, however, because of the costs of purchasing the building and its two acres of land, according to the Gazette.

ATG now has about 25 active members, Wiseman said. He estimated that the house on Sunset Avenue can hold about 22 or 23 people.

UM debates massive college reorganization

BY NICK BUSH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Over the past two months, the University of Massachusetts has begun the massive undertaking of planning a major reorganization of schools and departments on campus.

On Feb. 4, Chancellor Robert Holub published a memorandum proposing the elimination of four schools and their integration into two new schools. Under his initial plan, the College of Humanities and Fine Arts (HFA) and the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences (SBS) would be merged into a "College of Humanities, Arts and Social Sciences," and the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics (NSM) and College of Natural Resources and the Environment (NRE) would be merged into the "College of Natural Sciences."

Holub's proposal also called for resource economics to be included in the School of Management and for the School of Nursing to move into the College of Public Health and Health Sciences.

Holub also appointed a Reorganization Task Force led by professor Jane Fountain, which aimed to give the faculty's feedback to the administration.

"Deliberation is critical," said Fountain. "[The faculty] have a certain perspective that needs to be taken into account. We are the ones in the trenches."

While Fountain and the other members of the faculty task force agreed with Holuh about the merger of NSM and NRE, they came to a different conclusion than the chancellor about what the University should do with HFA and SBS.

The Reorganization Task Force's March 12 report recommended that the proposed mergers of NRE with NSM and of HFA with SBS "be considered as two separate plans. The considerations and logic of these proposed mergers are completely different and must be considered separately."

"We wanted to pull the life sciences [NRE and NSM] together – that has grown out of the faculty's wishes for more integration and partially out of need from the economic crisis," said Fountain. "Working out the details of such a merger is complicated – there's a lot of careful planning and decision-making left."

Such a move would be consistent with UMass' goal of expanding its research, particularly in the life sciences, said Fountain. However, the Reorganization Task Force did not agree that merging HFA and SBS would be in the University's best interests.

"We strongly recommend against a merged college combining HFA and SBS," said the March 12 report. "This would entail two strategically different and labor-intensive transitions resulting in a loss of productivity. Further, a merger of HFA and SBS works against the strategic advancement of research, education and engagement for the campus."

"[We have] ample time to study the matter and provide a well-informed recommendation [to the chancellor]," said Joel Martin, dean of HFA, who is tasked with deliberating what the best options are for HFA and presenting his findings in the 2009-10 academic year to Chancellor Holub.

Professor Jane Fountain, leader of the Reorganization Task Force.

The possible combination of HFA and SBS appears driven by more financial necessity than by a desire for increased collaboration, but it is still unclear what option, of the many at his disposal, Chancellor Holub will proceed with next year. The Reorganization Task Force ultimately suggested a few alternate plans, most notably the idea of forming a College of Arts and Sciences (CAS).

The March 12 report noted that the "administrative unity" of a CAS "would break down bureaucratic stovepipes that impede collaboration across colleges for research, teaching, faculty activities, programs for students and a range of other core tasks."

Facebook owns user content

Site updates rules, maintains rights to all uploaded material

BY NIINA HEIKKINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Facebook users may want to think twice about what they post on their profiles. Following last month's changes to user rights and responsibilities, Facebook now has permission to use, copy, publically display and distribute material uploaded to its site, until users disable their accounts, according to the Facebook Site Governance page.

Under the new terms of the Facebook Principles and Statement of Rights and Responsibilities, users maintain ownership of their content, however, the company can share that information freely with other Facebook users, unless users place specific restrictions on how their content can be shared by adjusting their privacy settings.

Under the former terms of use, Facebook had permission to use posted content indefinitely, even after an account had been cancelled.

Facebook users were given the opportunity to vote on the proposed policy changes for the first time last month, following a policy shift designed to increase the company's transparency.

Of the over 200 million Facebook users worldwide, just over 665,000 users took part in the voting, which ended April 23.

Approximately 74.4 percent of those who voted supported the changed terms of use, said Facebook General Counsel Ted Ullyot in a company blog post. The voting results were currently being reviewed by an outside auditor, said Ullyot.

In a video clip advertising the online vote, Mark Zuckerberg, the CEO and founder of Facebook, said that the rapid expansion of Facebook prompted the company to make changes to increase its transparency.

"With a community that large and engaged, it needs a more open process of governance," said Zuckerberg.

In addition to voting on the proposed changes, users also had the chance to make comments or ask clarifying questions about Facebook policy.

The new policy also introduces new limitations on who can have Facebook accounts. According to the new rules, individuals from countries embargoed by the U.S. or individuals in the U.S. who are on the United States Treasury Department list of Specially Designated Nationals will not be permitted to have Facebook accounts.

The company is also cracking down on fake accounts. Facebook now requires that users have accurate contact information on their profiles or risk having them removed from the site.

Facebook advertised the vote by "translating the documents and voting application into several of the most popular languages on the site, showing a message about the vote on user's home pages, and running advertisements and videos across Facebook promoting the vote," said Ullyot.

Facebook CEO and founder Mark Zuckerberg promoted the site's recent changes to share uploaded content indefinitely.

However, the majority of Facebook users questioned said they had not seen the ads and thought the company could have done a better job informing users of the vote.

"I think it's honestly really unfair. I signed up for Facebook years ago and never was asked to agree to these new policy changes," said Matt Firmani, a junior double majoring in psychology and computer science.

Eugene Mont, a junior who is pursuing a bachelor's degree with individual concentration, said that he had seen the ads on his newsfeed but had not felt compelled to vote.

"It wasn't a big deal for me because I've never been concerned about my privacy on Facebook, but I know it's been an issue for many people, so I think allowing people to vote on some of the policies is great."

'Autism USpeak' event raises $25K

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the biggest fundraisers on the University of Massachusetts campus, the "UWere, UAre, USpeak Autism Speaks 3K Walk 5K Race" was held on Sunday, May 3, in an effort to raise awareness and money for autism.

With 220 participants attending, the event raised close to $25,000. Entertainment ranged from face painting to a live concert. There were auctions and raffles, and every participant received $5 worth of "Burrito Bucks" from Bueno Y Sano. The winning male, Andrew Erwin, and female, Isabella Donadio, of the 5K race each received a $100 Visa gift card.

According to the Autism Speaks website, "Autism Speaks is dedicated to increasing awareness of autism spectrum disorders, to funding research into the causes, prevention and treatments for autism and to advocating for the needs of individuals with autism and their families."

Autism Speaks works with both the National Alliance for Autism Research (NAAR) and Cure Autism Now (CAN), the leading autism awareness organizations.

Isabella Donadio won the women's 5K race at Sunday's fundraiser.

Autism is a brain development disorder that impairs social interaction. Autism disorders are diagnosed in one in 150 children in the United States, however, they are more common in boys. The diagnosis of autism has increased dramatically in the past years. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) have called autism a rational public health crisis whose cause and cure remain unknown.

The idea for the event first began at Penn State University with a walk called Autism Speaks, which raised more than $91,000 in the first year and over $550,000 over the past four years. Penn State then began an initiative to spread to other universities such as the University of Connecticut, Maryland University, and UMass with a subsequent event called Autism Speaks!

"Next year, Alpha Epsilon Pi and Sigma Delta Tau want to make the walk race bigger and better," said UMass Autism Speaks chairman, Jason Grass. "We are hoping on doubling the participants and total and getting the community more involved."

Crime Log April 27 – May 3

"This was a busy weekend for us; we had a number of events, some of which went smoothly, but then we wound up with some arrests," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. The annual spring concert was held on Sunday, and the UMPD took stricter measures to ensure there were less alcohol-related incidents this year. "We've taken a bit of a stronger stance with the spring concert in the Mullins Center where previously people have gotten in and either they've been drinking before or found ways to drink once inside – throwing up and causing a mess in the bathroom – we've tried to do a better job of catching those people at the doors," Archbald added. There were "upwards of 40," arrests and protective custody's at the concert this year, said police.

MONDAY

Zachariah Joseph Brown, 19, of 80 Webster Road Milton, Mass., was arrested in Gorman dormitory at 3:44 p.m. and charged with distribution of a Class D drug, possession with intent to distribute a Class D drug, possession of a Class D drug, possession of a Class B drug and possession with intent to distribute a Class B drug.

"This was an investigation that began with our detective bureau from confidential information we received from an informant," said Archbald. "We worked that information and other resources available to us, and it became known that Brown was dealing out of his room," he added.

The UMPD then conducted an undercover investigation and were able to eventually purchase drugs directly from Brown, according to Archbald.

"We used our own staff to conduct yet another buy with marked money, and it was determined he was selling," said Archbald.

The Deputy Chief was also candid on how on operation of this type works. "We will pose as buyers and make inroads to the target. By gaining confidence of the target, we can do more and more buys and larger amounts," he said.

THURSDAY

Luis M. Tapia, 21, of 41 Ogden St. Indian Orchard, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on East Pleasant Street at 2:02 a.m. and charged with OUI liquor, two counts of marked lanes violation and possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle.

FRIDAY

Joshua Paul Davidson, 20, of 192 Beaman Road Sterling, Mass., was arrested for liquor law violations while driving on Fearing Street at 8:08 p.m. and charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and transporting liquor unlawfully.

Vincent Berry Swopes, 18, of 262 Brentmoor Road, Jose David Gonzalez, 23, of 126 Manor Circle and Robin Dale Gonzalez, 18, of 835 Oak St. all from East Hartford, CT, were arrested in Lot 34 at 11:59 p.m. and each charged with breaking and entering vehicle/boat in the nighttime for felony and malicious destruction of property over $250.

"We had an officer who was posted for parking lot patrols, and he observed two males basically casing the parking lot and attempting to enter into a vehicle by pulling on door handles," said Archbald.

After continuing to watch the men for some time, the officer then allegedly observed Robin Gonzalez break into a car.

"He was handling the [inside] contents of the car, and then another car pulled up and items were starting to get transferred from one car to the car that had just pulled up," he said.

The three men drove off but were stopped on Massachusetts Avenue by police.

"Officers then went back to the car in the parking lot and noticed the glove box and dashboard were damaged," said Archbald. An Apple IPOD was stolen.

Martin David Greenberg, 19, of 2828 Main St. Barnstable, Mass., was arrested in Lot 32 at 12:51 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct and malicious destruction of property over $250.

Raul Daniel Duverge, 20, of 111Yale St. Medford, Mass., and Jeffrey Adonai Munoz, 20, of 71 Kittredge St. Boston, Mass., were arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue at 2:48 a.m. and both men now face alcohol offenses. Duverge was charged with OUI liquor, possession of liquor while under the age of 21, possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle and unsafe operation of a motor vehicle. Munoz was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

SUNDAY

Jeffrey Hill, 19, of 13 Nancy Court Blackstone, Mass., was arrested after an annoying behavior call to police to respond to Philips Street. The arrest occurred at 12:04 a.m., and Hill was charged with disorderly conduct, malicious destruction of property over $250 and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest.

"The officer was on patrol in parking Lot 34 and a large number of people were walking through the area going to and from Southwest," said Archbald.

As the police were driving through the lot, they noticed Hill allegedly damaging a parked car. "They observed a male identified as Jeffrey Hill violently striking a motor vehicle with a pine branch that was approximately five and a half feet long; he swung the branch over his head multiple times and struck the hood of the unoccupied car and then walked away," he said. After seeing the officers, Hill allegedly ran away as the police chased him.

"He was stopped and officers smelled an odor of alcohol on him. There was also a fair amount of resistance by him – wrestling around," Archbald added.

According to police, Hill would not get fully down on the ground and put his hands behind his back, so he was pepper sprayed.

Patrick Henry Brown, 21, of 162 Main St. Leeds, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant Street at 1:56 a.m. and charged with OUI liquor, leaving the scene of property damage and obstructing a stationary emergency vehicle.

"Brown was traveling north on North Pleasant Street when he hit the side of a cruiser on a traffic stop. He then failed to stop," said Archbald.

About a quarter of a mile down the road Brown was stopped by another officer according to police. "He failed the field sobriety tests on the scene," he added. No one was hurt in the accident.

Mustapher Lubega, 24, of 27 Water St. Concord, Mass., was arrested after an alleged domestic disturbance in Coolidge dormitory at 6:40 p.m. and charged with domestic assault and battery and larceny under $250.

University proposes academic restructuring

According to the findings of the task force, all of UMass' peer schools, except for one, use the CAS model, which is the dominant national standard.

"Common sense says that shared structures enhance some forms of collaboration and remove barriers, and indeed, that's why many faculty argued for an arts and sciences type of structure," said Martin. "Regardless of the structure, we need to continue to improve the experience for our students and make sure they have access to excellent advising, good facilities and the best faculty."

When asked whether he supported the formation of CAS, Martin suggested that he would if it "would enable us to advance our campus strategic goals."

"There are good models out there of how to do that and how not to do it," said Martin. "[These models show] what can go right if you invest adequately, and, unfortunately, what can go wrong even if you spend a lot of money."

"More and more you have intersections of technological topics and humanistic topics," said Fountain. "By having a College of Arts and Sciences, you make a very strong statement about interdisciplinary commitment. It would standardize and streamline – we could reduce red tape and fragmentation."

Swine flu cancels hand shakes

BY KEN CARLSON
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

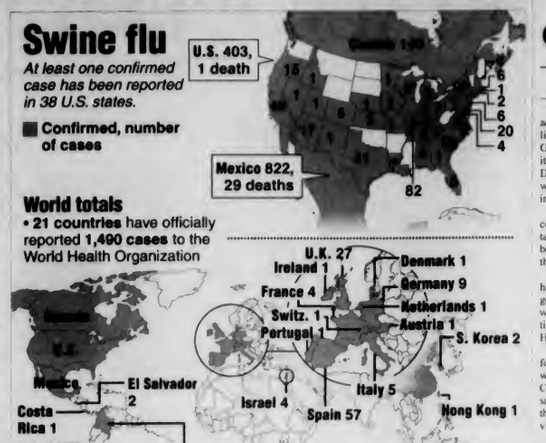
MODESTO, Calif. — Modesto Junior College in California canceled its graduation ceremony Friday evening because of concerns about min and swine flu.

The result: many students were upset they didn't get to walk the stage.

"I'm pretty devastated," said Toby Ann Burch, a 31-year-old general education student who worked to put herself through school. "It took me a long time to get to this point and I wanted to celebrate the moment."

Like other graduates, she bought clothes, sent invitations to friends and family, and planned a post-graduation party. An estimated 350 to 400 students were expected to attend the stadium ceremony.

Their anticipation was shattered when, 90 minutes before the ceremony was set to start, MJC President Richard Rose told graduates gathered in the gymnasium the ceremonies were off. He apologized to students and their families. Students were OK with not getting soaked, but wondered why commencement couldn't take place in the gymnasium.



MJC is not the only local organization on alert. The Catholic Church's Stockton Diocese is urging parishioners not to hold hands during prayers, among other measures, and Stanislaus County's chief election officer is moving polling places from schools.

MJC spokeswoman Linda Hoile said the ceremony was canceled because of fairly heavy rain and wet, unsafe field conditions at the stadium. With rains in the forecast this week, officials had considered using the gymnasium but ruled it out, citing a Yosemite Community College District flu pandemic plan and the county's heightened alert for swine flu, she said.

"Normally we have the gymnasium as a backup, but we decided against it because of the swine flu concern about putting people in enclosed areas," Hoile said.

Rose said that with swine flu cases increasing in California and other states this week, the district's emergency plan went to a higher level calling for social isolation and cancellation of campus activities.

A decision to use the gym needed to be made Thursday morning to set up the staging and sound equipment, Rose said. Officials decided to move forward with the outdoor commencement, hoping the weather would cooperate.

The ceremony is reset for Wednesday at the MJC stadium.

"We had no way of controlling the inclement weather conditions," Rose said. "We have rescheduled. We hope the students and family members will be able to come back and participate."

But many were disappointed.

"We understand that they are taking precautions for the swine flu but they should have at least let people know like yesterday," said Claudia Aguirre, who came from the Bay Area to see sister Janet Rivera graduate. "We all took the day off."

Rivera said she and her family attended a campus luncheon earlier Friday and no one with MJC mentioned postponing graduation.

Columbia College held its graduation indoors Friday as it does every year. The two colleges are part of YCCD.

There are no reported cases of swine flu in Stanislaus County, but San Joaquin County reported a second probable case Friday. An 8-year-old student at a school in Linden, who had no recent travel to Mexico, came down with flu symptoms Monday; lab tests showed it probably was swine flu.

The girl has recovered and the county public health service has advised Linden Elementary School to close next week, said Wendi Dick, assistant health director for the county. Tests still are pending to confirm if a 31-year-old Tracy woman had swine flu.

The possibility of school closures prompted Stanislaus County Registrar of Voters Lee Lundrigan to move polling places from schools for the May 19 statewide special election.

Her office is moving 18 school voting sites, most of which are in Modesto and Turlock. Many will be consolidated with other polling locations, Lundrigan said. Her office will mail postcards telling registered voters where to cast ballots.

Bishop Stephen Blaire, head of the Stockton Diocese, is advising parishes to take precautions such as not holding hands during prayers and ensuring that priests and deacons wash their hands before serving Holy Communion. The diocese has parishes in Stanislaus, San Joaquin, Calaveras and Tuolumne counties.

Blaire's memo to parishes Friday advised against sharing the cup during communion and advised partaking of only the consecrated bread. Church members were encouraged to use other gestures in greeting each other during Mass.

Guantanamo closure on hold

BY DAVID LIGHTMAN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration's bid for $50 million to move prisoners from the Guantanamo Bay detention facility in Cuba was left out of the Democratic-authored emergency war-spending bill unveiled Monday in the House of Representatives.

Even so, most Democrats remain committed to closing down the military prison, and the issue is likely to be attached to other legislation later this year.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates had sought the funds for the emergency spending bill in case the U.S. wanted to begin building an alternative facility for the detainees soon. He called the funds "a hedge."

He still has influential support for that approach in the Senate, where Appropriations Committee Chairman Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, said he still backs the funds "as of this moment yes, unless I'm convinced otherwise."

"It's not over yet," he said of the Pentagon's effort.

It's unlikely, though, that the House will back any funding for this short-term legislation. When House Democrats released their $94.2 billion spending package Monday for funding the Iraq and Afghanistan wars and related expenses through the fall, the $50 million for Guantanamo was missing.

Leadership spokesmen explained there were two problems: The Pentagon has no policy in place yet for using the money, and Republicans as well as skeptical Democrats were likely to block the whole spending bill if the Guantanamo funds were included.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis., noted that there is no specific closure program yet.

"We will work with President Obama on the funding and policy to achieve our goal of closing Guantanamo Bay," said Nadeam Elshami, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

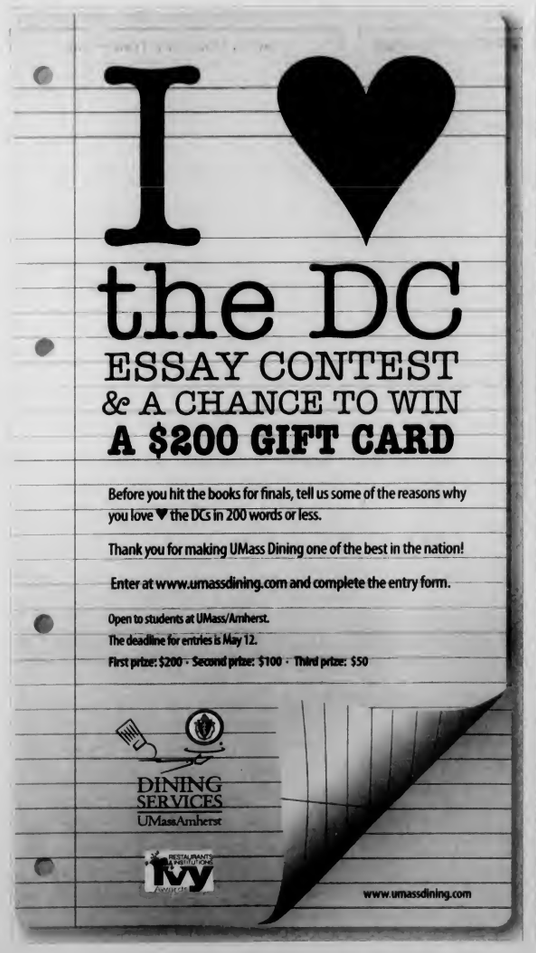
Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., made plain the opposition's viewpoint: "Clearly, the administration lacks a plan and a safe alternative for closing Guantanamo," he said in a Senate floor speech.

"The American people want to keep the terrorists at Guantanamo out of their neighborhoods and off of the battlefield," he said. "At this point, the only way we can assure them that neither one of these things will occur is for the administration to keep this secure facility open until it develops a sensible plan for the Congress to evaluate."

Several Democratic senators voiced confidence that Congress ultimately will fund a plan to close Guantanamo. Many lawmakers first want to see a plan for closing Guantanamo and relocating detainees.

"I have no doubt that once the administration decides on a plan, that plan is going to go forward," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., the chairwoman of the Senate Intelligence Committee. "I know there are some detainees to be continued in detention, some can be released and some can be repatriated," she said. "We need a plan."

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., an Appropriations Committee member, noted that the fight over the funds could last through the summer.



While the emergency bill would spend money immediately, Congress is also about to start writing its fiscal 2010 spending bills for the 12-month period, which begins Oct. 1.

"I suspect there will be other opportunities to do this," he said.

House Republican leader John Boehner of Ohio said that GOP lawmakers would look carefully at any effort to include the funding in future legislation.

"Removing this funding doesn't give the administration a green light to airdrop it into another bill down the road," said Boehner spokeswoman Antonia Ferrier. Though the House Democrats' bill provides money primarily for the two wars, it also includes $2 billion to help fight a possible flu pandemic.

Most of the funds would go to developing and buying vaccines and supplementing federal stockpiles, and $250 million to aid state and local governments to help prepare for and respond to a pandemic.

Party safe, drive safer

Ben Moriarty

It's the day after Cinco de Mayo. That means that, even if you aren't Mexican or whether you could tell someone what Cinco de Mayo is, you are probably hung over. Tequila loves doing that to you.

It also means that it is the end of the school year. It is time to huckle down for finals, and as my mom says, "keep your nose to the grindstone." She knows me well enough to know that I need to do that but also well enough to know these words fall on deaf ears.

Here at the University of Massachusetts though, the end of the year means many things: hanging out on the hill, laying out in the sun, playing Frisbee, hanging out at hippie beach and of course, an abundance of parties.

Though to many students' dismay, the police are also well aware of this. And they don't like it one bit. Well, actually, they might – but not for reasons that benefit the students.

This is why, as The Massachusetts Daily Collegian reported last week, the police are increasing the numbers on patrol for upcoming weekends.

Both the UMass Police Department and the Amherst police are stepping up their game to stop underage drinking and drinking in public. Watch out Hobart and Pufflon. They are coming for you.

They are also putting police officers at bars to catch people with fake IDs. So watch out underage people, because they are finding you at both the bars and off-campus parties.

Obviously this will not hinder underage drinking one bit. It is against the law, sure, but sobriety will just not happen, especially when it's the last weekend here.

It is true, I bet, that underage people should not be breaking the law no matter how dumb they think the drinking age is. They probably should not be holding false identification cards either, and it's dumb to advocate that the police should just ignore the law because "it's going to happen anyway."

Instead of sending officers into apartment complexes and on streets at night to find underage people and those who are stumbling around, they should focus on stopping it preemptively.

If someone is breaking the law, they are breaking the law. And while mercy is a gift, it is not unfair or unjust to face proper consequences. Saying that cops should go after and focus on underage people at a house party instead of other areas is just, well, needlessly wasteful.

If there were to be an increase in protection, it should happen in one area specifically, and that is on the roads. It is no surprise – no matter how dumb everyone knows it is – that people drive after drinking. The potential for death in an alcohol-related accident is so much greater than some dumb freshmen drinking too much.

And hell, if that happens, the chance of the cop stopping that moron from dying is slim to none, considering that's the medics' job. The chance of the cop saving an innocent driver is much greater if the cop were to pull over the drunk driver first.

Instead of sending officers into apartment complexes and on streets at night to find underage people and those who are stumbling around, they should focus on stopping it preemptively. By making people leave parties earlier and by checking out parking lots before students leave, the police will decrease the amount of potential drunken drivers along with the number of arrests.

From my own experiences last year, having two of my best friends get kicked out of the University because of an incident that happened on the last weekend of spring semester, the only suggestion I have is to not be dumb. No party is worth losing your credits for the semester and having to leave school.

If you don't think that is going to happen, you have not been paying attention to the image repair and remodeling that is happening right now. The school has no qualms about getting rid of anyone who engages in the "party image" it is trying so desperately to eliminate. UMass is attempting to enter a new phase in its life, and anyone who holds it back will be sent away.

Since this column will not change the way the police will go about it, the only thing you can do is be smart this weekend, especially if you are going to the townhouses and Hobart. Don't broadcast your presence, don't drink and drive and don't be an idiot – really.

No party is worth an arrest and possible suspension from school.

Well, maybe. Maybe not.

Spring a time of rebirth, goodbyes at UMass

Matt Kushi

Yet another academic school year is nearing its end. It is the season of flowers blooming and warm sunshine beating down upon us. Yes, it is the season of pollen as well. The runny eyes and wheezing noses are enough to tell anyone that.

In the college world, the beginning of the true spring is marked by the increased stress levels that come with final exams and papers. Many college students pray for the glory days of summer to come a little bit faster.

However, the end of the academic school year also means that it is time to say farewell to many of your friends. This is never a fun task. These are the people that you have just spent the past eight months around. You have most likely seen more of them than your own family.

Underclassmen can take comfort in the fact that after three refreshing months, they will see their friends once again. For seniors, things are not that easy. If you are a senior graduating, you have just reached a vital fork in the road. You are on the starting block of your new life. You will not be coming back to school to carouse with your friends. Instead, you will be entering the realm of life that we so often hear adults call "the real world."

If you are a graduating senior, you may be sitting in a state of shock, wondering if it can already be over. It seemed just like yesterday that you were sitting at orientation, wondering what the future held.

You may be remembering the sweet innocence that you felt at that orientation of entering that new phase of your life. That taste of beautiful freedom that you felt during your freshmen year. That feeling of independence throughout your four years of college.

In college, we are maturing from young adults into full adults who have purpose. In that purpose, we find the people who we bond with. In that sense, our college friendships are cemented in a blanket of purity.

All of those friendships that you discovered in a world not color-coded with the name of your hometown community written all over it.

Suddenly it's all over, and you are left wondering what to do with all of the pieces of yourself that you have fused together over the years. It's probably the same feeling that you had after graduating high school. Only this time, the leaving and entering of one part of the world to the next is real. It can be scary. Your life may feel like a Bob Dylan song where the answers are just "blowing in the wind."

The one thing that may be scaring you the most, even more than the fact that you must find a job, is the fact that you think that all of those friendships are gone. This is where nothing can be further from the truth. If you are true to yourself and know who you are, you will keep the friends that touch your heart so much.

Maybe this theory I have is not true. For some, it probably isn't. However, for others it may be. My theory is that the friends that you make in college are more pure than your childhood friendships.

Though a junior, I know that I will have to remind myself of all of this next year when I graduate. I have a feeling, though, that I will keep in touch with my friends. Many college friends do.

Many of us, down the road, will be going to each other's weddings and hanging out just for the fun of it. To all of those graduating seniors that are forlorn about college ending, don't be. You are trained and prepared to move on with your life. You didn't major in alcohol, though it may have seemed that way. Ultimately, you will find your way in life and have a wall of friends that surround you, whether they are from childhood and college, or from your adult and work life.

In the end, nothing could be truer than a sign in my parents' home that simply reads, "A circle of friendship is never-ending."

"Don't ask, don't tell" a bigoted policy

Dave Coffey

Of all the policies the Obama administration will hopefully soon reverse, perhaps the most backwards is the "don't ask don't tell" policy. I fail to understand how anyone could promote an idea as outdated and counterintuitive as this.

Are people really that afraid of something different from themselves?

For anyone who's not aware of the "don't ask don't tell" policy, it's the common name for the U.S. military's policy regarding homosexuality. Enacted in 1993 during the Clinton administration, it was basically a compromise between those who wanted to allow homosexuals to serve in the military and those who didn't.

As a sort of compromise, the policy states that gay men and lesbians are allowed to serve in the military. However, they are not allowed to engage in any kind of homosexual conduct or let anyone know that they're homosexual ("don't tell") and the military is not allowed to officially inquire as to what a military personnel's sexual orientation is ("don't ask").

While this "compromise" policy is obviously better than just not allowing homosexuals to serve in the armed forces, there's still plenty wrong with this policy.

Ultimately, it's still a ban on openly gay people serving in the military. If it's made apparent that someone serving is homosexual, or if they take part in any homosexual conduct, they can be immediately discharged because of it. On top of this, even though superiors aren't allowed to initiate investigation into a person's sexual preference without substantial grounds because of the "don't ask" part of the policy, mere suspicion of homosexual behavior is warranted as "substantial" grounds for investigation into the person's private life.

I almost find it hard to believe a policy such as this actually exists in a modern industrialized country in the 21st century. Do people really have this much fear for what they don't understand? The reasoning for not allowing gays in the military is frankly ignorant at best.

According to a statement released by the U.S. Department of Defense in 1981, "Homosexuality is incompatible with military service," and that anyone who is homosexual who engages in homosexual conduct "seriously impairs the accomplishment of the military mission. The presence of such members adversely affects the ability of the armed forces to maintain discipline, good order and morale."

Do people really have this much fear for what they don't understand? The reasoning for not allowing gays in the military is, frankly, ignorant at best.

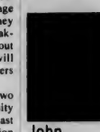
Are we seriously supposed to believe that someone's sexual preference is a serious determining factor to his or her ability to act properly in the line of duty? If you're a guy who is attracted to men, does that automatically mean you can't comprehend "discipline" as much as a heterosexual person? If you're a woman who is attracted to other women, does that mean you're a threat to "good order?" Is your sexual orientation directly related to or detrimental to your "morale?" If the term equality means anything to you, the answer to all these questions should be an obvious "no."

Sometimes people ask, "Should gays be able to marry?" or "Should gays be allowed to serve in the military?" These questions sound just as ridiculous to me as someone asking, "Should black people be allowed to marry and serve in the military?" They're on the same level of any other ignorant bigotry you can think of.

Obviously, a lot of people in the past have condemned homosexuality in some different ways than other differences. In a rather contradicting twist of ignorance, people have viewed homosexuality as both a mental disorder as well as a conscious choice by the person in question. However, both of these viewpoints have had piles of evidence pitted against them in recent years.

According to the American Psychological Association (APA), "gay, lesbian and bisexual orientations are not disorders. Research has found no inherent association between any of these sexual orientations and psychopathology."

Homosexuality is not some disability that can be "cured," even though in the past the U.S. military has used a similar theory to discharge military personnel. Likewise, many anti-homosexual groups claim that being gay is the individual's own fault because it's a lifestyle choice. The APA also points to the fact that in many cases concerning homosexuality, "most people experience little or no sense of choice about their sexual orientation."



More and more research is pointing toward genetic, hormonal and biological factors that may aid in determining sexual orientation in humans.

The main question here is this: What about someone's sexual preference allows or disallows him or her to directly serve and protect their country? Does a homosexual body take a bullet worse than a heterosexual body?

Since its inception, the "don't ask, don't tell" policy has caused the military to discharge over 12,500 troops due to homosexuality. Should a phenotype really be grounds for bringing someone up on charges, especially when all they were trying to do was serve their country? As cliché as it sounds, at a time when it seems we could benefit from coming together more, it doesn't exactly help to divide ourselves meaninglessly because of an outdated policy.

Facing a dead end

John Glaser

Some people warn that the current state of the nation and its apparent trajectory into the 21st century signals the coming of the end of American economic and political dominance. I say, we're already there.

Simon Johnson, former chief economist at the International Monetary Fund (IMF), wrote a piece in The Atlantic Monthly claiming that our economic problems resemble, with stunning precision, those typically found in emerging-market oligarchs, where the lines between business and government, private and public, is less than obvious to say the least.

"Emerging-market oligarchs get carried away," Johnson said. "They waste money and build massive business empires on a mountain of debt. Local banks, sometimes pressured by the government, become too willing to extend credit to the elite and to those who depend on them ... sooner or later, credit conditions become tighter and no one will lend you money on anything close to affordable terms." Sound familiar?

The public-private partnerships, the corrupt, tightly bonded brotherhood between big business and government, helped lead to this current economic crisis in that these corporations and financiers did their bidding and reckless gambles with the implicit backing of government. Turns out it wasn't so implicit.

What's worse is that, now that they've all gone under, they are using their influence, much of it manifested from lavish campaign contributions and back-door deals, to direct the way the government deals with this crisis. All these transparency-lacking bailouts and Federal Reserve "quantitative easing" that Barack Obama and his corrupt minions in Congress claim are absolutely necessary, directly serve the interest of the business elite.

Sen. Dick Durbin, a powerful Senate Democrat, let something slip while being interviewed on a Chicago radio station. Speaking of the difficulty in getting Congress to back bankruptcy reform, he said that banks, being among the most powerful lobbies on Capitol Hill, "frankly own the place."

Despite all this ... liberals and conservatives alike applaud the government's recent attempts at so-called recovery as necessary and heroic – the only option to save the economy.

Politicians are trained professionals in the art of lying through omission, but once in a while they apparently slip up.

But of course, he's right. Just last week a staffer of Barney Frank, who is chairman of the House Financial Services Committee and a Democrat, gained employment as top Goldman Sachs lobbyist. This is just another day in Washington though, small potatoes.

The architect of the original bailout plan, Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, was, of course, the former CEO of Goldman Sachs. Larry Summers, a leading engineer of the Obama administration's economic policies, receives a regular flow of cash from the corporations now receiving taxpayer booty.

The New York Times recently reported that, while he was head of the New York Federal Reserve, current Treasury Secretary Tim Geithner "forged unusually close relationships with executives of Wall Street's giant financial institutions" and "his actions, as a regulator and later a bailout king, often aligned with the industry's interests and desires, according to interviews with financiers, regulators and analysts and a review of Federal Reserve records."

He typically dined with top executives of Citigroup, Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley and JP Morgan Chase. And these are the guys for whom he is now constructing bountiful bailouts.

Despite all this, which is terribly obvious to even the amateur follower of current events, liberals and conservatives alike applaud the government's recent attempts at so-called recovery as necessary and heroic – the only option to save the economy.

The increase in government involvement in the economy has been a fact for a long time now. But, recent events have upsurged the abandonment of market forces for an all-encompassing government. Governments, not private actors, already own the world's largest oil companies, and most of the largest private corporations enjoy the kind of special treatment that ensures economic preeminence regardless of performance. State-owned investment portfolios account for one-eighth of global investment, and this figure is increasing.

Ian Bremmer, in Foreign Affairs magazine, wrote that, in place of the free market, "has come state capitalism, a system in which the state functions as the leading economic actor and uses markets primarily for political gain."

This is systemic, says Bremmer, and has introduced massive inefficiencies into global markets as "economic power and influence [increasingly transfers] to the central authority of the state."

These kinds of characteristics of government and markets are typical of emerging countries. They are not usually linked to countries with high rates of prosperity and freedom – much the opposite. Without an abrupt halt to this frightening world of a permanent confluence of government and business – of state capitalism – America will inevitably reduce herself to the lower rungs in the international order of progress, freedom and peace.

Prime time for Goldblum

By Luaine Lee
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

PASADENA, Calif. — Actor Jeff Goldblum always searches for humanity in the roles he plays, whether it's a 6-foot fly, a chatty chaos theorist or a scuff-shoed cop.

"Sometimes acting is uncomfortable," he says, " ... sometimes you go, 'Why am I doing this? This is painful.' But on the other side of it, you constantly taste the fruits of it. This sweet fruit of connectedness with other people, connectedness with myself, something delicious," he grins in the piano lounge of a hotel here.

The star of such films as "Jurassic Park," "The Right Stuff" and "Silverado" is pounding the mean streets of New York this season as Detective Zach Nichols on USA's "Law & Order: Criminal Intent." He alternates with Vincent D'Onofrio, who plays the know-it-all Detective Robert Goren of the city's Major Case Squad.

Goldblum has wanted to act since he was kid and watched with fascination children's theater productions.

"Acting is scary and uncomfortable and sometimes unpleasant and miserable-making and anxious-making. But I'm more and more clear about being happy and grateful that I'm in that," he says, leaning his long torso in toward the table.

Playing Zach Nichols can be a challenge, he says. "I can be complacent or frightened, so it's good for me to be forced to confront with things that cause me to be open myself up and go beyond my fears. It's very good for me. If I hadn't gone through that, I wouldn't be feeling things that make me open."

Wading through the process of acting never stopped him. In fact, Goldblum has been working as an actor since he did "Shakespeare in the Park" as a teenager. "When you go through this process it's the antidote to this poisonous notion that you have to worry about the future," says Goldblum, 56, who's wearing a charcoal suit, white dress shirt and narrow, knitted green tie.

"It's pointless to worry about the future because there is no such thing. There's only now. In fact, if you contemplate the future with too much psychological attachment and too anxiously – it's true you don't have the resources (to rise to the role) because you're not there. But once you get there, you start to trust more and more: 'I'll get there and I'll be supplied with just enough to do it.'"

Goldblum was only 17 when he left his home in Pittsburgh and headed for New York to study with acting guru Sanford Meisner. "The decision to just say 'yes' to this wild-hearted, unreasonable idea to go out and be an actor, and to be lucky enough to go to New York at that age and study with Sandy Meisner, have a very good teacher – that was SOMETHING," he nods.

His first year there, his parents supported him. "They set me up in an apartment in Manhattan not far from the school and paid for the school and luckily after a year I got my first job and started to support myself and haven't had to have a straight job since. They helped and were very supportive. That changed me," he says.

Two years later one of his older brothers, who was 23, died suddenly. "I was 19. That made a mark on my psychic emotional landscape. He was a writer, was traveling – he was very adventurous and kind of romantic. He loved Hemingway, and he was near Casablanca and got a quick kind of disease and died in 24 hours.

"It makes you ask, what can change about you? Even when things change and even when you lose things that you thought were a part of you, as we all do – we lose our youthfulness, our abilities, our relationships seem to be fleeting finally.

"Everything goes finally. Everything's going to go. We finally lose our lives. Everything is constantly changing but who are YOU? Are you all the arrangement of things, the elements of your life that keep changing? Or are you something deeper, beyond all that that never gets changed, no matter what is collapsing around you?" Pausing, he says, "That interests me. All plays and movies are about that anyway."

People often define Goldblum as "quirky," but he's really introspective. Sometimes his ideas spin so fast, he leaves out phrases or words.

He approaches the part of Nichols the way he does his other roles – part psychologically, part emotionally.

"There's always something shocking, some violent crime, but my parents in these stories are shrinks, and I have this psychological bent. And I think I'm not only helping civically to bring people to justice, we've done something which will help their soul's evolution," he says.

"The people who were victimized by them need to find some closure by finding out who did it and all around there are people grieving, and they come into contact with these solvers. And there's an opportunity to do real soulful work with people. And, of course, wherever there's loss there's a kind of portal or opportunity to find people suffering that (results in) a kind of enlarged sense of who we ALL are."

Married twice, once to actress Geena Davis, Goldblum says he has a girlfriend now but "no special sweetheart."

"The more I go on, I'm utterly on the frontier of freedom ... I'm nothing but open hearted."

Jeff Goldblum, known for his roles in "The Fly" and "Jurassic Park," among others, recently joined the cast of "Law & Order: Criminal Intent." Goldblum plays Zach Nichols, a New York detective, alongside Vincent D'Onofrio as Detective Robert Goren.

'The Duke of Uke'

101-year-old ukulele player Tapia to release new record

By Mike Osegueda
McClatchy Newspapers

At 101, ukulele player Bill Tapia is age-defying.

He answers his cell phone for an interview – yes, he has and uses a cell phone.

Tapia is believed to be the oldest active musician in the U.S. – and possibly the world.

While he often needs help getting around the stage, his hands and his mind work fine.

For example: Upon hearing my last name, he was immediately able to recall playing music with my great uncle in the 1960s. He not only remembered it, but he talked for five minutes about stuff that happened almost 50 years ago.

"I'll be damned," Tapia says. "He was a good piano player."

As for his hands, they're still doing what they do best – strumming the strings. There was so much interest in a San Francisco performance of his in April that a second show had to be added because the first sold out.

They don't call him "The Duke of the Uke" for nothing.

"He put on a tremendous show," says Pat Wolk of the Fresno (Calif.) Folklore Society. "Everybody wanted their photograph taken with him. He sold Lord knows how many CDs. Now he has another CD out. One hundred and one? Are you going to have a CD out when you're 101?"

Putting out that CD, "Livin' It Live," is just one of Tapia's age-defying acts.

On the CD, a live recording, there's a part in the song "Undecided" where the crowd oohs and awes because he's playing the ukulele behind his head.

Tapia still teaches music – twice a week from his Southern California home. His ukulele students have ranged in age from 8 to 80.

He recently got an offer to play in Japan, and, of course, he wants to do it. "I want to keep going until I'm gone," he says.

Believing in himself has gotten Tapia a long way in the music business.

He was 7 when he first started playing the ukulele. A native Hawaiian, the ukulele was almost something he was born into.

He learned from the original ukulele players and – get this – came up with his own version of "Stars and Stripes Forever" in 1918 at age 10. Get him to play today and he might introduce it by saying, "Here's a song I performed during World War I."

As he got older, Tapia wanted to play jazz, so he took up the guitar and banjo instead.

He led a big band, was a vaudeville performer, played on cruise ships and eventually became a music teacher.

It would take about 60 years until Tapia started to play the ukulele again.

And now, it's turned into another career for him and something else to keep him going.

"I don't know what I would do if I didn't play. I feel restless," Tapia says. "I can't read the damn music anymore, but if you're close up by me I can see you. If you're six or eight feet away, all I see is a blur. But I get along like nothing is happening and I play."

Nowadays, word of Tapia spreads on YouTube.

Imagine that, a guy born on New Year's Day in 1908 – a guy who predates the MP3, CD, cassette and eight-track tape – getting his ukulele music passed around via YouTube.

Ask Tapia and he'll tell you – it feels good.

"It's like taking good medicine," he says.

Director Abrams revitalizes Star Trek franchise, complete with Spock and Kirk

By Robert W. Butler
McClatchy Newspapers

As rousing as a Klingon war chant and more fun than an engine room full of ribbles, "Star Trek" successfully reboots the venerable franchise. It will please diehard fans and suck in newbies like a black hole.

This happy romp from director J.J. Abrams takes us back to the youths of Kirk, Spock, Uhura, Bones, Scotty and all the rest. While the film's central crisis isn't exactly novel – aliens threaten to blow up Earth – the execution, acting and energy are on warp drive.

In the film's prologue, a gigantic, bizarrely constructed alien ship (it looks like the squid in Disney's "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea") is attacking a much smaller Starfleet vessel. The acting commander of the besieged ship is able to jettison his pregnant wife on an escape pod, and the last thing he hears on the com before the ship explodes is the wail of his newborn son.

That kid will grow up to be James T. Kirk (Chris Pine), a car-stealing, hard-drinking, authority-defying ne'er-do-well. After getting into a lopsided bar fight with a bunch of Starfleet cadets, Kirk is challenged by a seasoned starship captain (Bruce Greenwood) to enroll at the academy and channel his aggressions into something useful.

He is quickly surrounded by hard-working, rule-obeying folk-like physician Leonard "Bones" McCoy (Karl Urban), the gorgeous but tough Uhura (Zoe Saldana), weapons expert Sulu (John Cho) and whiz-kid Chekov (Anton Yelchin).

Kirk also discovers a nemesis in Spock (Zachary Quinto), the emotionless half-Vulcan who applies rational thought to every situation and finds Kirk's shoot-from-the-hip spontaneity "illogical."

The arrival of the same alien ship we saw in the prologue demands that the cadets cut short their training and report for active duty on the Enterprise. The bad guys are Romulans, and their chief, Nero (a nicely intense Eric Bana, almost unrecognizable beneath bald pate and tattoos), announces he's out to avenge the destruction of his planet .

But this "Star Trek" is supposed to be a prequel, and the Romulans don't show up until later in the saga, so what the..? Well, Roberto Orci and Alex Kurtzman's screenplay has a time-travel element. Nero's Romulans are visitors from the future, and, "Terminator"-style, they're trying to head off doomsday by zipping backward in time to eliminate their enemy before he can do damage decades in the future.

The young performers, cannily selected to look and act like the original "Star Trek " players, are so spot-on that you get a warm fuzzy glow just watching them.

You may have seen Pine in "The Princess Diaries 2" or maybe even in "Bottle Shock." But as Kirk, he perfectly captures the cocky, swashbuckling confidence that marked William Shatner's performance. Quinto is a dead ringer for a young Leonard Nimoy, although he lacks the deep, resonant voice of that actor (maybe his Spock will find those bass notes as he matures?).

Urban, who mostly had been seen armored up on horseback in the "Lord of the Rings" trilogy, is a pure delight as the irritable but loyal McCoy. Expect the audience to erupt in cheers when he fumes at Spock, "Dammit, I'm a doctor, not a physicist!"

Late in the film we discover Simon Pegg's Scotty stranded on a frozen planet – he comes aboard the Enterprise and quickly shows the kids how to use a transporter. Pegg has the appropriate brogue but plays the character more for laughs than James Doohan did. But that's OK.

One complaint: This "Trek," like the original series, is a bit heavy on the testosterone. Saldana's Uhura is the only strong woman character, and even she isn't given much to do. She does have a torrid affair that will knock the hardcore fans back on their heels. It's one of several key rewrites of the franchise's mythology that keep us guessing.

The less-than-original story elements and convoluted plotting keep it from being a really great movie. Some of it is pretty confusing. Maybe even illogical.

Nevertheless, "Star Trek" is a pretty great time at the movies, an opportunity to reacquaint ourselves with characters who are part of the collective consciousness.

Oddly enough for a franchise that stretches back 40 years, "Star Trek" makes us feel as if we're just at the beginning.

Chris Pine (James T. Kirk) and John Cho (Sulu) star in J.J. Abrams's new adaptation of "Star Trek," which hits theaters this weekend. The actors' performances and appearances mimic those of the original cast though younger, as the film acts as a prequel.

UMass after 21st A-10 Title in last 24 years

on a low note as they lost their final four regular season games and five of their last six. St. Louis took both games against the Bonnies earlier in the season.

St. Bonaventure (12-26, 9-11 A-10) is instead riding into the Bronx on a high note after a thrilling 4-3, 12-inning victory over Temple on Sunday with the No. 6 seed and a berth into the A-10 Tournament on the line.

The winner will move on to play Charlotte on Thursday at 3 p.m., and the loser will play another game immediately after the conclusion of the game against the loser of the St. Joe's and Fordham game.

UMass's first opponent of the tournament may be undetermined, but to Sortino, it makes no difference who the Minutewomen will play.

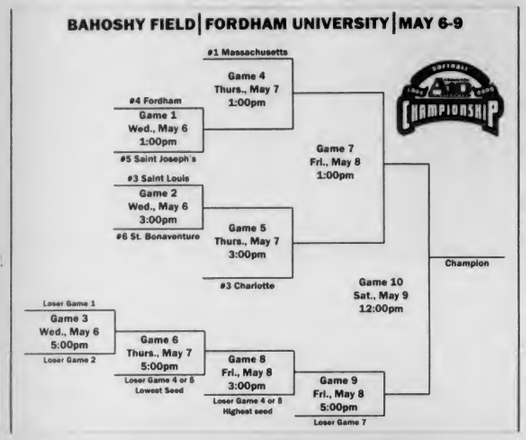
"Everybody is going to be tough. Everybody is going to play us tough. They did earlier in the year, and they are going to now," Sortino said. "There are no weak sisters in this tournament."

The Minutewomen are coming off a loss to Fordham – a possible opponent on Thursday – in the final game of the regular season, and it makes the best team in the conference even hungrier.

"It makes us very hungry. With or without that loss, we're starving," Sortino said. "We're very, very focused on what we have to do."

And what UMass has to do, according to Sortino, is to have everyone play well. The team is not relying on one player to carry the Minutewomen through the tournament, but instead a solid team performance.

"I think the best part about this year's team is that they have been consistent and reliable," Sortino said. "One person hasn't had to do something extraordinary. Everyone has to be good, and if everyone is good, we're great."



The Minutewomen may have goals that extend past this weekend's tournament, but they understand that without a good showing this weekend, there is nothing past this weekend.

"Our goal is our conference title. That is our goal," Sortino said before leaving Tuesday for the tournament. "We've worked very, very hard to position ourselves to get to the conference championship. That is always our goal, and now it is to win it."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

After leading the Minutewomen at the top of their lineup, centerfielder Carly Normandin came out on top in votes by the A-10 coaches as she was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year.

5 named to first team

men Sarah Reeves, third basemen Whitney Mollica and leftfielder Samantha Salato were also named to the first team, with Mollica also being named to the A-10 All-Academic team.

The middle of the Minutewomen's infield, shortstop Whitney Williams and second baseman Kyllie Magill, were both named to the All-Conference Second Team. Magill and fellow freshman Sara Plourde were both named to the All-Rookie team.

BUMP IN THE ROAD

Going into the postseason, a team likes to have momentum – maybe winning its last couple games, feeling really good about themselves.

The Minutewomen, however, didn't exactly do that.

UMass pitched six consecutive shutouts in a row, dating from the April 28 series against Rhode Island to the first game of last Sunday's series against Fordham. It was in the second game of the doubleheader, however, in which the Minutewomen were beaten.

Bailey Sanders and Plourde couldn't escape the second inning. The two combined to give up five runs, five hits and three walks. Sortino decided she saw enough when Plourde, on her second batter, gave up a single to extend the Rams' lead to 5-0. Sortino called on Balschmiter, the previous game's winning pitcher.

Balschmiter did what any reliever is supposed to do – give her team a chance to win. Balschmiter struck out 11 while only allowing two hits over six innings of work.

If Balschmiter suddenly comes down with an injury or is unable to pitch for some reason, the Minutewomen would certainly be in trouble since Plourde isn't pitching as effectively as she was earlier in the year.

The Minutewomen might have to face off against the Rams again on Thursday as they wait to find the results of the Fordham, Saint Joseph's game later today.

LEAD-OFF THREAT

It's been written time and time again when the Minutewomen have been discussed – Normandin is a offensive contribution at the top of the lineup. The junior hasn't let up at all during the regular season. She leads UMass in almost every offensive category.

Normandin tops the team in batting average, runs, hits, doubles and triples just to touch upon a few.

In the field, Normandin is just as effective. The center fielder has only made one error this season and has a fielding percentage of .966. If the Minutewomen want to play effective offensively and score some runs, Normandin will have to continue to contribute from the top of the lineup.

STEPPING IT UP

Rarely have the Minutewomen struggled in areas, but if there had to be one concern, it would be with their defense. Numerous times this season, UMass has committed over three errors per game, which in turn cost it runs and, on one occasion, the game.

On April 26, the Minutewomen fell to Charlotte, 11-6. Six of the 49ers' runs in the game were unearned, thanks to four UMass errors. Fielding miscues almost cost the Minutewomen the game on April 8 against Boston College, despite UMass' winning in nine innings. Three Whitney Williams errors helped Boston College get back in the game and helped the Eagles extend the game into extra innings.

As a team, the Minutewomen are solid defensively. On the season, UMass has a .972 fielding percentage, which by no means is poor. But the Minutewomen have to watch out for defensive blunders to repeat as A-10 Champions.

Gedman leading on offense

standings, the final spot for teams to make the A-10 Tournament.

Several players on the team are producing offense for the Minutemen. Sophomore shortstop Matt Gedman has quietly been on a 10-game hitting streak, including going 4-for-10 this past weekend against St. Bonaventure. In that series alone, he had three runs batted-in and scored one run, as the Minutemen swept the series.

Gedman is batting .259 this season with 28 hits and 18 RBIs.

Donato punished the Bonnies as well, going 5-for-12 with four runs and two RBIs. He has hit safely in the past three games since having an eight-game hitting streak broken up by Vermont.

A mid-week game like this has little weight on UMass' chances of advancing to the conference tournament, but the Minutemen have plenty of reasons to go into Boston and try to extend the Huskies' losing streak.

"We still have eight games to go, and I think the team's energized," Stone said of the Minutemen's morale after sweeping St. Bonaventure this past weekend.

"We had a good series this weekend, and everybody's excited about the future, as we should be. We need to take advantage of the opportunity to play and play well."

UM eyes 5th straight title

Awaits opponent after earning first-round bye in tournament

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Despite losing twice in conference play this season – after winning 49 consecutive Atlantic 10 games – the Massachusetts softball team has once again claimed the A-10 regular season title and a No. 1 seed in the upcoming Atlantic 10 Softball Championship.

The No. 1 seed gives UMass (35-8, 16-2 A-10) a first-round bye as they campaign for their 21st conference title when the A-10 Tournament commences on Wednesday, May 6 at Bahoshy Field at Fordham University in Bronx, N.Y.

With an automatic bid for the NCAA tournament on the line, the No. 19 and four-time defending A-10 Champions Minutewomen, will not be found looking beyond this weekend's challenge.

"We never look past it. Are you kidding? It is the doorway to where we want to go," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "We can't go to the NCAA tournament if we don't become the automatic qualifier."

The double-elimination tournament features the top six teams in the A-10 standings with Charlotte, last year's runner-up, taking the No. 2 seed and the other first-round bye. St. Louis finished third in the standings and will take on sixth-seeded St. Bonaventure Wednesday at 3 p.m. Beginning the tournament at 1 p.m. on Wednesday will be No. 4 Fordham and No. 5 Saint Joseph's.

The Rams (36-20, 13-7 A-10) are coming off one of their biggest wins of the year as they finished off the regular season by upsetting UMass, 5-4, for their first-ever win in Amherst. The win was Fordham's second win over a ranked opponent on the year, the other coming against then-No.14 Fresno State when they pulled off the 5-2 victory back in February.

Against St. Joe's (23-18, 9-7 A-10), Fordham faired well this season taking both games back at the beginning of April. The Rams took Game 1 of a doubleheader 8-6 before knocking off the Hawks 6-2 in Game 2.

The winner of the two will face UMass at 1 p.m. on Thursday, and the loser will move to the loser's bracket to play an elimination game at 5 p.m. on Wednesday.

The second game on Wednesday will feature No. 3 St. Louis and No. 6 St. Bonaventure. The Billikens (31-21, 12-6 A-10) are heading into the tournament

The Atlantic 10 gave out its yearly awards yesterday, and just about every Minutewomen brought something home. UMass had five players named to the All-Conference First Team, two others to the second team and two named to the All-Rookie team.

UMass rakes in yearly awards

Balschmiter, Normandin and Sortino all take home honors

By Ryan Fleming and Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

After dominating the Atlantic 10 the way the No. 19 Massachusetts softball team did this past season, it comes as no surprise that they also dominated the Atlantic 10 year-end awards.

For the fourth-consecutive season, Brandice Balschmiter was named the A-10 pitcher of the year, and for the first time in senior Carly Normandin's career, UMass' (35-8, 16-2 Atlantic 10) leadoff hitter, was named the A-10 Player of the Year.

UMass Softball

Balschmiter finished the season 28-4 and had a perfect 12-0 mark in conference play. She also finished with the league's lowest earned-run average (0.96) and finished fourth nationally with her league-leading 18 shutouts.

"[Balschmiter] has really become a pitcher this year," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said of her ace. "She's got up; she's got down; she's got off-speed like never before."

The award made Balschmiter just the second student-athlete in A-10 history to win four consecutive major awards in her respective sport.

For Normandin, the honor comes in a season when the center-fielder hit .439 overall and league-leading .515 in conference play. The senior also was tops in the A-10 in slugging percentage (.770), hits (65) and total bases (114).

"Normandin has been so reliable and consistent, and she has delivered so much for us – not only in the conference but throughout the course of the year," Sortino said. "I'm thrilled for her."

Sortino's players were not the only ones being honored by the league's coaches. Sortino was named A-10 Coach of the Year, the 10th time she has won the award.

Along with winning pitcher and player of the year, Balschmiter and Normandin were named to the All-Conference First Team. First base-

Out for some redemption

Minutemen hope to avenge loss in Beanpot to Huskies

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Today is a day of possible redemption. The Massachusetts baseball team will look to avenge its thwarted attempt as repeat Beanpot champions at the hands of Northeastern.

The two teams last met at Fenway Park, where the Huskies (22-20, 8-10 Colonial Athletic Association) beat the Minutemen, 5-3.

UMass (19-22, 11-10 Atlantic 10) coach Mike Stone feels that his players are more than ready for the rematch in Boston.

"We're looking forward to playing Northeastern because we lost to them 5-3 in the Beanpot final," Stone said of the Huskies. "It's good to have a game mid-week because we didn't have one two weeks ago, and we were a little rusty going into that weekend series."

The weather for Wednesday does not look good, with a 50 percent chance of rain going into the contest.

"Even though showers are forecasted, they have field turf, so it shouldn't be an issue," Stone said.

Given that UMass plays mostly in New England, it has seen its share of games get washed away. The Minutemen have had four games postponed and one game cancelled this season.

Regardless of the weather, UMass is poised to take on a Northeastern team that has lost its last five contests. Prior to the Beanpot championship, the Huskies had won their two previous games.

In the championship game, UMass' bats were mostly silenced. The Minutemen were outhit by the Huskies, 12-9, including five players going hitless while stranding 11 runners on base.

Bryan Leigh started the game for UMass strong, allowing three hits through two innings with two inning-ending strikeouts. Yet Northeastern touched Leigh up for three runs on four hits including a throwing error by right fielder Mike Donato.

Leigh would recover to pitch the next 2-2/3 innings without allowing another run and striking out a total of seven batters before handing the ball to reliever Charlie Benson.

Benson allowed an inherited runner to score, giving Leigh four earned runs, before giving up an earned run of his own.

Northeastern starter Les Williams pitched five innings of scoreless baseball, giving up four hits while striking out five and walking two.

UMass didn't get on the scoreboard until the ninth inning when the Minutemen tallied three runs on four hits and one error, none of which were earned.

UMass will need to find more logical ways not only to beat Northeastern but to finish out its season to keep itself in the running for post-season play.

The Minutemen currently sit in sixth place in the conference

See BASEBALL on page 6

Junior Bryan Leigh was given the loss back on April 13 as he gave up four runs in five and two-thirds innings pitched against Northeastern in the Beanpot Championship. UMass heads to Northeastern this afternoon to take on the Huskies in its final road game of the regular season.

ECAC season ends, Loyala falls short

PSU takes third in final season, Stagnitta coaches South team

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

The entire regular season came down to the final game to determine which team would land the top spot in the Eastern College Athletic Conference and walk away with an automatic berth into the NCAA Tournament.

No. 15 Massachusetts, controlling its own destiny, came through in a big way with its season on the line to defeat Rutgers in an overtime thriller on Saturday afternoon. Tied at 10 goals each after 60 minutes of regulation, the Minutemen (9-5, 6-1 ECAC) got the fifth and most important goal of the day from senior attackman Tim Balise to wrap up the conference title with an 11-10 win over the Scarlet Knights.

ECAC Lacrosse

Entering the game, UMass was in second place and a half game behind Loyola for the top spot. The Minutemen defeated the Greyhounds, 8-6, earlier in the year, and the win, placed them above Loyola in the overall standings.

With the victory, the Minutemen will travel to New Jersey Sunday to face fourth-ranked Princeton (12-2, 5-1 Ivy League) in the first round of the NCAA Tournament at 5 p.m.

Falling short

Thirteenth-ranked Loyola concluded its season on Sunday in heartbreaking fashion with a loss in double-overtime to No. 7 Johns Hopkins (9-4) while subsequently having its ECAC title hopes crushed with UMass' win.

Despite posting a 9-5 overall record against the third-toughest schedule in the country, the Greyhounds did not receive an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament during Sunday's selection, ending their streak of two consecutive tournament berths.

Back of the pack

Hobart made a valiant comeback in their final game of the season before falling, 8-7, against No. 6 Cornell on Saturday.

The Statesmen battled back from an 8-1 deficit late in the second quarter, rallying with six unanswered goals while holding the Big Red scoreless in the second half. Cornell's (10-3, 5-1 Ivy League) offense, which ranks first in the nation, had not been held scoreless in a quarter previously this season.

Hobart finishes the year in sixth place with a 7-7 overall record and a 2-5 conference record.

With a 17-5 victory against St. John's on April 25, Fairfield ended the season tied for third in the conference, the team's best finish in its four years in the ECAC. The Stags (7-6, 4-3 ECAC) recorded their most wins in a season since they tied a school-record 11 victories in 2005.

Penn State defeated Georgetown in a 12-11 double-overtime victory on Saturday for its sixth-straight win to close out the season. In its final season in the ECAC, the Nittany Lions went 9-5 overall and 4-3 in the conference, good enough for third place.

With the loss on Senior Day at the Hilltop, the Hoyas (7-7, 3-4 ECAC) closed out the season in fifth place. Before this year, Georgetown had never lost more than two ECAC games in a season.

The Hoyas were also not selected to compete in the NCAA Tournament for the second year in a row.

The 11-10 overtime loss to UMass dropped Rutgers to 4-11 overall and 2-5 in ECAC play. Though the Scarlet Knights just missed finishing in last place in the conference, they recorded the most losses overall by any team in the ECAC this season.

St. John's took a step back this season after finishing in sixth place with two conference victories in 2008. The Red Storm managed only one win in seven games in the ECAC, putting them in last place with a 5-9 overall record.

Stagnitta honored

Jim Stagnitta, the head coach for the Scarlet Knights, was named the coach of the Division I/II South team at the annual USILA North/South Senior All-Star Game. The game will be played at Harvard Stadium on Friday, May 22 and will be part of a triple-header that includes a Major League Lacrosse game to close out the night.

Mixed results for NoHo BID

Lower revenue from fees stifles plans for city improvements

The Business Improvement District proposal hopes to increase revenue in downtown Northampton by cleaning up the area and adding certain services. The proposal, which was passed last month, has recently been met with opposition.

By Chris Russell
Collegian Staff

The proposal to establish a Northampton Business Improvement District (BID) was passed by the Northampton City Council last month after two years of lobbying by the proposal's supporters.

Smith College and downtown property owners united to form the BID partnership. According to the city's website, the BID, through fees on property and a $35,000 annual stipend from the city, will "provide a wide range of services and programs not provided in... basic public services."

Such services include reducing "aggressive solicitation," physical improvements to the downtown area and building a new police station, according to the BID proposal.

This vision of an improved downtown met with opposition when about half of the potential properties decided not to join the district, which reduced the budget from nearly $1 million to about $400,000. District officials said this reduced budget will decrease the amount of services the district is able to provide once membership fees are collected next year.

The district has also endured other opposition, including a lawsuit alleging it was created in violation of state law and a protest march through downtown which resulted in two arrests.

The proposal was passed on March 5. The Northampton City Council voted 8-1 to establish the BID, and on March 19 the City Council voted 7-2 to accept the Memorandum of Understanding (MOU), an agreement which legally obligates the city to provide services to the BID.

David Bardsley, a member of the City Council for 16 years, voted for the BID because he did not have a problem with "independent business people who want to get together and pool their money and do some thing to make downtown more attractive."

He voted against the MOU because he felt Northampton should not "obligate itself to an independent third party [the BID] who could in theory sue us if we violated our obligations under the MOU."

The BID intends to decrease the amount of panhandling and soliciting within the city of Northampton. However, some have objected to the anti-panhandling language in the BID.

Attorney Bill Newman, director of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) Western Massachusetts office, said in a Jan. 29 Valley Advocate article that, "The BID language should be amended or changed before it is adopted ... You don't have to rush into this."

Northampton's district is one of several around the state in which property owners in a contiguous area elect to pay a fee to fund services for that area, including maintenance, physical improvements and tourism promotion.

Supporters say the city needs these services now because a "bold approach is needed to ensure Northampton's prominence as a destination and continued growth" due to a recent erosion of "the strong underpinnings of downtown," according to the district's website.

"I don't think the Chamber of Commerce has the strength or the funds to drive enough business downtown as I would like, and hopefully the BID can help with that," said Kate Glynn, a local Northampton business owner.

Glynn describes herself as being "very

UMassOnline sees strong growth in enrollment, revenue

By Claire Broschuk
Collegian Staff

UMassOnline, the program that offers online courses at the University of Massachusetts, has reported double-digit growth in both enrollment and revenue.

This follows an eight-year-old pattern of growth for the online education system, which was originally implemented in 2001. According to a press release, the reports for fiscal 2009 show an 18 percent increase in enrollments and a 27 percent increase in revenue. The enrollment total has increased nearly by 6,000 online students while revenue has increased by nearly $10 million.

Based on the current economic troubles, more people may be motivated to return to school and acquire an additional degree. In these circumstances, online learning provides an educational alternative for students beyond the traditional college age range of 18 to 25 years.

According to Jennifer Brady, UMassOnline Director of Marketing, there has been a push from both the media and educational advisors to encourage distance learning. Brady says that more and more people are "consistently urged ... to consider weathering an economic downturn by returning to school."

Although economic instability may be one of the reasons for increased enrollment, Brady recognizes that there is no way to specifically quantify that effect.

For people who are seeking college degrees later in life, turning to online education can be more flexible than traditional forms as well as more financially attainable. UMassOnline courses cost significantly less than a semester's tuition at any of the institutions in the UMass system.

Adam Leader-Smith, a sophomore social thought and political economy program (STPEC) major, said he believes that "[online classes] help people who otherwise would be too intimidated, they feel more comfortable participating online."

This may also explain why many UMass students currently supplement their classroom education with online courses in an effort to acquire more credits and graduate early, thereby lessening the financial burden of higher education.

"Much of the online technology developed for, and used in, online learning has found its way to traditional college classrooms throughout UMass, meaning that on-campus students have seen and validated for themselves the value of this learning option," added Brady. Despite the large increase in enrollment, UMassOnline does not anticipate the need to hire more staff members.

Brady said that "continued growth in our enrollments implies a need for increased bandwidth and the involvement of more faculty members as they identify and develop courses for online distribution." But this would not necessitate an increase in UMassOnline staff, which is currently composed of 12 people.

One of the main criticisms of distance learning has often been that the lack of interaction and community that traditional classroom settings can create

Benefit concert to be held in honor of deceased student

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Daniel and Lyssa Fassett asked not to be sent flowers when their son, Darby Ethan Lloyd, a University of Massachusetts journalism student, died of an accidental heroin overdose on May 7, 2008.

"I like flowers. I like to see them grow," said Daniel Fassett, Darby's father. "But we decided we'd rather do something good with the money."

The Fassetts donated the money that would've gone toward flowers on the grave of their only child to the Center for Alcohol and other Drug Abuse Prevention (CADAP) at UMass. Now the Fassetts, Darby's friends and classmates along with University Health Services (UHS) are organizing a benefit concert, to be held on Friday, May 8, to raise awareness about student stress and substance abuse, raise money for the CADAP and honor Fassett's memory.

Called "Be The One: A Benefit Concert and Creative Art Project in Memory of Darby Fassett," the show will be held at Bowker Auditorium from 7 p.m. to midnight. It will feature area bands, as well as Daniel Fassett's band, The Doctors of Flight, and an art project that reflects on loss caused by substance abuse.

"I just wanted a way to get the rest of the community involved, in case they didn't know [Darby] or haven't experienced a loss due to drugs and alcohol," said Elise Forcino a UMass senior and childhood friend of Darby's who organized the art project. "Drugs and alcohol do affect us in our everyday lives, whether we realize it or not, and I wanted to give people an opportunity to reflect on how it does affect them."

Forcino, her friends and roommates and members of UHS have been tabling for the event in the Lincoln Campus Center, encouraging people to create art that reflects on abuse and prevention. She said the response has been modest, but owns that up to the reluctance of un-artistic types to create art.

UMass student Darby Fassett who died last year.

"It's not about being artistic," reads the sign on the table. "It's about self expression."

The concert and art project aim to end the silence and stigmas surrounded substance abuse and prevention.

"The number one thing is to build awareness that there are places you can go, things you can do about it," said Daniel

Rivals meet again

UMass looks to reverse previous outing

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Looking to avenge their latest defeat of the regular season, the Massachusetts softball team will take on fourth-seeded Fordham in the Bronx in its opening game of the Atlantic 10 Softball Championship on later this afternoon.

UMass earned the No. 1 seed and first-round bye for the tournament by claiming the A-10 regular season title with a 35-8 overall record and a 16-2 record in conference play. The four-time defending A-10 champion Minutewomen are searching for their 21st title overall and their 14th in the last 15 years.

Fordham (36-20, 13-7 A-10) is coming off of a win in the first-round against No. 5 seed Saint Joseph's on Wednesday at Bahoshy Field, host of the A-10 Championships.

Brandice Balschmiter will be looked upon to carry the Minutewomen throughout the playoffs.

The hometown favorite Rams fell behind the Hawks (23-18, 9-7 A-10) early, as Saint Joseph's picked up two quick runs in the first and another in the second inning. The Rams came back with a three-run fourth inning to tie the game before taking the lead for good with a pair of runs in the fifth to hold onto the 5-3 win.

Membership fees too high for some

pro-BID." She owns "Impish," a store in Thorne's Marketplace and "A Child's Garden" on Main Street.

Northampton faces a $6 million deficit, and opponents say the district is being wasteful in advocating for BID, which will cost the city and businesses money.

District membership fees are one half of one percent of property valuation, or $500 for every $100,000. Only property owners can opt out of the district, meaning businesses that rent their retail space could be subjected to mandatory rent increases if their landlord joined the district.

Such concerns resulted in 267 out of 499 parcels – the city's term for identifying properties – opting out of the district, according to Northampton City Hall.

One of these properties that opted out was the 'State Street Food Store.'

"A lot of the budget is going to marketing out of the area, and being a grocery store, I wouldn't really benefit from that," said owner Richard Cooper. "I would also have $13,000 a year in membership fees, which doesn't really make sense for me."

Some contend that the district is not only bad policy, but was created in violation of state law. Massachusetts General Law stipulates that 60 percent of property owners in the proposed district area must sign a petition before public discussion of the district can begin.

Northampton counted a signature for each parcel in the district area, rather than one signature per property owner, to account for the 60 percent. Those who filed the suit – downtown property owners Alan Scheinman, David Pesuit and Eric Suher said the city's use of the "one signature, one parcel" system was improper.

Scheinman noted the law doesn't say 60 percent of the parcels, it says 60 percent of the property owners.

"If the BID proponents had interpreted the statute how it is clearly stated they would never have had enough signatures to go forward" said Scheinman. "They don't have 60 percent of the owners, but they do have more than 60 percent of the parcels."

Elizabeth Hahn, coordinator of the Massachusetts Department of Housing and Community Development, said the state recommends communities use the "one signature, one parcel" system because "BIDs are made up of the parcels in that district so every parcel has to be represented."

The suit also alleges that the city accepted illegible signatures, failed to verify independently of district supporters that the petition met legal requirements and that assenting signatures were collected before the district petition was drafted.

Teri Anderson, Northampton's economic development coordinator said the law doesn't require the city to verify that the person signing the petition is a property owner, only "that the [district] petitioners obtain a signature and for us to verify that a signature has been obtained."

This interpretation of the law allowed Northampton to accept assents to the district petition for three parcels that gave only "Center Street" as the address, according to Northampton City Hall documents.

Although the law does not explicitly mandate how communities should verify signatures, Scheinman said the verification methods used by Northampton were improper.

If the lawsuit succeeds, he said the district would cease to exist, and clearer standards would be set for future district petitions in the state. A ruling on the suit could take anywhere from several months to over a year, according to Scheinman.

Opposition over the district has also come from the homeless advocacy group, Poverty Is Not a Crime (PINAC). According to an anti-district website maintained by PINAC, the district will "gentrify" downtown by removing low income people to make way for upscale luxury businesses and those who are affluent Caucasians.

Obama to push for border reform

BY PETER NICHOLAS AND ANNA GORMAN
LOS ANGELES TIMES

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama will ask Congress for $27 billion for border and transportation security in the next budget year, fulfilling a promise to the Mexican government to battle the southbound flow of illegal weapons and setting the stage for immigration reform by first addressing enforcement, administration officials said Tuesday.

The spending, an 8 percent increase over this year's, will enable the administration to hire more agents and enhance security at airports and seaports. Obama also will request more money to expand screening for illegal immigrants in jail and to improve a Web-based program for verifying workers' employment eligibility.

The funding requests are part of the 2010 budget Obama plans to present to Congress on Thursday. Legislators last week passed a $3.5 trillion budget blueprint that tracks Obama's major policy goals, including a health-care overhaul and a push for renewable energy sources.

The border and immigration budget underscores differences with the Bush administration, which emphasized border fence construction, increased detention space and more teams to raid work sites. Obama has already changed the game on work-site enforcement, giving immigration agents new guidelines that shift the emphasis from illegal workers to employers who break the law by hiring them.

In devoting more money to security and enforcement, Obama may be creating some political space needed to revamp the immigration system. The president risks alienating many conservatives if he doesn't emphasize strong border and immigration enforcement before taking action on a reform package that would create a path to legalization for an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants.

"If the American people don't feel like you can secure the borders," Obama said during a prime-time news conference last week, "then it's hard to strike a deal that would get people out of the shadows and on a pathway to citizenship who are already here, because the attitude of the average American is going to be, 'Well, you're just going to have hundreds of thousands of more coming in each year.'"

Administration officials, who laid out the priorities for border and immigration enforcement Tuesday, said they wanted to use technology and personnel to help secure the Southwest border and to help battle Mexican drug cartels responsible for widespread violence that threatens to spill into the U.S.

More than 7,600 people have been killed in drug-related violence in Mexico since January 2008.

Department of Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano said Tuesday that the budget "clearly demonstrates the president's commitment to a smart and effective immigration policy."

"We are continuing to focus on tightening our borders and stronger enforcement, and this budget gives us essential new resources and tools to do just that," she said.

During his visit to Mexico last month, Obama said the U.S. would do more to stop the weapons that have found their way from the U.S. to Mexican drug cartels.

Standing next to Mexican President Felipe Calderon, Obama said: "This war is being waged with guns purchased not here, but in the United States. ... So we have responsibilities as well. We have to do our part. We have to crack down on drug use in our cities and towns. We have to stem the southbound flow of guns and cash."

Specifically, the budget doubles Department of Homeland Security funding to nearly $47 million to combat southbound firearms and currency smuggling, and adds more than 100 Border Patrol agents and Customs and Border Protection officers.

An additional $70 million will allow the federal government to hire 349 agents and investigators to work with the Mexican government on developing intelligence to better fight the cartels.

The budget includes an 18 percent increase for the Department of Justice's Southwest Border Initiative, which targets the violence fueled by the drug cartels.

The budget plan also calls for a 12 percent fiscal boost to the Transportation Security Administration, allocating $985 million at airports, $250 million at seaports and $1.9 billion for the Coast Guard. Much of the money will be spent on new technologies and additional security personnel.

Asked about Obama's pledge to change the immigration system, an administration official said Tuesday: "Enforcement has to be part of the equation. If the goal here is to get an immigration system that functions, enforcement is central to that."

Among the immigration enforcement priorities, the budget increases funding by 30 percent to nearly $200 million to enable the Department of Homeland Security to hire 80 new people to identify criminal immigrants in the jails and prisons for deportation.

Obama also wants to spend $112 million, a 12 percent increase, to make E-Verify, an employment verification program, more reliable and to get more employers to use it.

The emphasis on border security isn't a surprising first step by the administration, said Angela Kelley, vice president for immigration policy at the Center for American Progress, a Washington-based think tank.

"It's a no-brainer that he is going to want to spend a lot of resources and build muscle at the border," she said.

But she said that Obama shouldn't stop there.

"The second chapter," she said, "better be looking to Congress and being in the driver's seat, both publicly and behind closed doors, driving a legislative package successfully."

Parents hope to raise drug abuse awareness with concert

Fassett. "It's OK to talk about it."

"BREAKING THE SILENCE"

Police found Darby Fassett outside his off-campus home in Hadley at 11:52 p.m. on Wednesday, May 7, 2008. Shortly after arriving at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, he was pronounced dead, from an apparent accidental overdose on heroin.

He had been there before.

"The guy came out, and said 'We've been working on him for a while. We're sorry to say your son has passed – but he was here before.' Immediately, as if to say 'It's not our fault,'" Daniel Fassett said.

Darby had been sent to the emergency room three months prior, in February, but his parents hadn't yet received the bill for emergency care. Daniel Fassett said they didn't know their son was on heroin, and were told by the University that Cooley Dickinson had not notified them about Darby's overdose.

Daniel Fassett, himself formerly a drug counselor, said he told his son Darby that he didn't mind if he drank or smoked marijuana, but told him to stay away from heroin.

"I told him, 'You don't ride the horse – the horse rides you,'" he said.

Fassett said his son did "did such a good job of hiding it, so few people were aware he was doing this. He was still going to school, still working – not the picture that immediately comes to mind when you think of the stereotypical junkie."

He said Darby's silence was likely an act of love.

"Obviously Darby was trying to protect my wife and I from heroin," he said. "He thought he could handle it."

He said the hope in raising money for the CADAP is to improve access to resources for off-campus students, because there is little communication between the University and Cooley Dickinson.

"The second time you're caught with an open bottle of beer, they [the University] call your parents, no matter what age you are," he said. "But Cooley Dickinson can't notify them when – at least in Darby's case – they're paying the health care bills?"

Dr. Sally A. Linowski, director of health education for UHS, said that the CADAP looks not only to curb substance abuse on campus, but "ultimately to break the silence that surrounds it." The CADAP is most commonly known for its BASICS and Social Norms programs, but also hosts drop-in groups for substance abuse, as well as counseling and referrals for clean needle exchange.

She said proceeds from the concert will go specifically to their drug-related programs.

"Of course it'd be better if nobody did drugs," she said. "But this is human nature, human beings we're dealing with, so we aim for harm reduction."

Economy spurs online growth

"I think online education is a totally efficiency-based model," said Irene Ushomirsky, a senior at UMass. "It's a way to teach the most amount of people with the least amount of money but not having a campus, a community, is awful."

As technology becomes more entwined with higher education, it is expected that distance learning will be more appealing and acceptable to students.

According to Brady, "Lots of high school students today are being introduced to online learning nationwide."

UMassOnline expects the number of online students to grow across all age demographics as professors in traditional classroom settings continue to utilize technology as a medium for teaching.

Textbooks on Kindle

BY EMILY E. SMITH
OREGON DAILY EMERALD

CORVALLIS, Ore. — Amazon's newest version of its electronic reading device, Kindle, is expected to hit the market today with a larger screen suited to newspapers, magazines and the next frontier: textbooks.

Whether students or textbook publishers will find the slim, handheld screen with a spacious electronic page attractive is topic for speculation, but some Kindle textbooks are already available to buy. After purchase, Amazon wirelessly delivers the textbook copy to the device.

Major media have reported the new Kindle's rumored release from anonymous sources, following Kindle's second iteration that came out less than three months ago.

Amazon markets its wireless reading device as sleek, reader-friendly and designed for long periods of reading with no computer required, offering maximum portability.

While the wireless device could change the textbook-publishing market by eliminating production and distribution costs for publishers and eventually eliminating the bookstore, Kindle is not a pioneer in electronic literature.

The Duck Store began selling online electronic texts during the 2005-06 school year.

Gina Eckrich, textbook buyer at the Duck Store, said e-book sales are increasing, but the product still isn't very popular. She speculates this might be because of today's college students' attachment to the hard copy.

"A lot of college kids grew up primarily getting information through books," she said.

If that's how students are used to learning, a screen might not seem like the optimum format for engaging with text, she said. Adjusting readers' eyes to the electronic format might also take time, she added.

The grayscale digital screen doesn't appeal to Eckrich, who said she already spends too much time reading on a computer screen.

"Quite frankly, it's really hard for me to read," she said.

For 10 years, Eckrich said, book sellers have been contemplating the move toward digital products, but the lengthy transition from concept to reality eases her worries about the effects e-books might have on the industry.

"This is coming," she said. "More and more people want this, but it's going to be a slow process."

The e-books available from the Duck Store are online texts that students can read on their computers. The advantages: They are cheaper than new print books and as portable as a laptop. The disadvantages: Students can't sell or keep them because they disappear when the e-book subscription ends, typically after a year.

Stopping the awkward turtle

Nick Milano

With tax revenues for the commonwealth of Massachusetts below even some of the most pessimistic predictions – revenues for April were down almost 40 percent from last April – the state and, thus, the University of Massachusetts might be the victim of more spending cuts.

Even with a $3 billion shortfall already met, there might be an additional billion dollars that the state has to make up. For local communities, this will mean cutting to the bone where much spending has already been slashed. For UMass, this might mean the dreaded $1,500 fee increase will return.

Still, with this being the end of the semester and the beginning of a new one only a few months away, I feel as if there are more important issues that UMass must address before worrying how it can pay its own way – particularly, the awkward silences that plague classrooms, dorms and elevators all around campus.

This problem has festered since I first arrived back in September 2006. But, now with my junior year coming to an end much earlier and quicker than I would like, I decided it was time to take a stand against this ritual of silence which permeates the campus. You all know what I mean and just about everyone is guilty of it – myself included. But it's time to stamp out this illness whose debilitating effects are all too familiar.

The first major problem with people afraid to talk to one another is, obviously, that it makes everything more awkward.

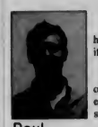
It is as if we are all back at freshman orientation and are all too nervous to make the first attempt at conversation. Whether it is in the few minutes right before class starts and the professor mercilessly begins to teach or on an elevator ride , what is worse than observing this unwritten rule of deafening silence?

I will always remember My Body, My Health discussions on Fridays because they were awkward to the excruciating extreme, to the point where no one would even answer the teaching assistant's questions.

How about those entertaining elevator rides? My favorite awkward moment is when everyone is stuffed in nice and tight and someone only rides up one or two floors in the library. Every single person on the elevator wants to scream, "Walk, you lazy bum!" But it is senseless to hope that such a moment will actually happen.

The second major problem is that some people's adherence to this stupid custom hurts those who want to make conversation. Try having a conversation in a room with one or two other people while all 20 others are sitting in silence, staring straight ahead or pretending to read The Collegian for the 10th time that day. It is certainly feasible, but the fun is taken right out of it. You know everyone is listening. Everyone else knows you know they are listening. It is just uncomfortable.

It is even harder to flirt with someone. I have even given up on it because of the feeling that all the guys in the room are judging your every move. It is like being under a microscope – people can follow along as either you crash and burn or attempt to ask for a number with an audience of 20 fellow students. Terrifying.



There you have it. Clearly the most important issue and one that pertains to all of us is this oath of silence most students at UMass seem to take especially serious. Perhaps over the summer, the UMass administration can implement measures to help make things less awkward.

Who knows, maybe we will come back to music in the elevators – fixing them can come later. Rocking out to some smooth saxophone melodies instead of staring at the floor numbers as they slowly tick by will certainly brighten my day. Maybe freshmen can bring with them to class the silly ice-breaker routines they learn to perfect at both orientation and during the first few days on campus.

Talking to a speechwriter this summer, he told me that a column should present an issue and that you should offer a solution while destroying the opposition. There should be no opposition where this is concerned. UMass is faced with an epidemic of silence – forget swine flu – that cannot be accepted any longer.

Why not?

Paul Payer

The Senior Column.

Joe Meloni, my managing editor and confidant on issues of ice hockey and fine beverages, called me yesterday afternoon to see if I was going to actually write one.

"Sure why not," I replied.

If you gather one thing from this column before you move on to the Sudoku puzzle on the next page (don't bother it's an easy one), I hope it will be the mentality encapsulated in that statement.

Why not try something new? Why not commit yourself to a project or goal which seems completely ludicrous and outside your comfort zone, join a club, quit a club and start a new one opposing the one you just quit? Why not switch majors, switch social groups, study abroad, create a website or eat three calzones from Bruno's in one night? Do whatever you think you cannot and enjoy it as part of this experience called college.

I never had any intention of writing for a newspaper, running a business or traveling Europe. I experienced all those things because, when faced with the opportunity to write for The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, work at Campus Design and Copy, study abroad and do other things which seemed improbable or uncertain, I repeatedly failed to produce a qualified answer to the question, "Why not?"

At no point in my life will I ever have had the freedom and opportunity to experience all the things I have in the past four years. Soon there will be bills, mortgages, kids and nine to five workdays to anchor me in the daily minutia of reality. The past four years offered no quantifiable reason not to experience everything I could.

At times, I grew apprehensive about tackling a new challenge or changing the direction I had been heading in. I learned that disappointment is inevitable and that failure can push one forward in the direction of success.

Most of us won't receive an A in every course, or get accepted to every graduate program we apply for or even find the perfect job we wanted.

That's OK. If everything did work out for us, we would never be able to appreciate the gratification of getting an A or receiving that long awaited phone call or letter in the mail. I've always believed that students from the University of Massachusetts embrace that essential mentality.

When faced with the opportunity ... I repeatedly failed to produce a qualified answer to the question, "Why not?"

As the flagship campus of the state university system in a region brimming with Ivy League colleges and elite institutions, UMass students tend to walk around with a collective chip on our shoulders.

Ask most students at UMass if they would trade their four years of hard work and perseverance at this University for a trust fund and dormitory at Boston College and I suspect the answer will be relatively uniform and include a few colorful lines picked up from four years of rivalry between UMass and Boston College or Boston University.

Most of the columns I wrote for The Collegian were composed with consideration for my audience – for those willing to actually sit down and read the 800 words I selected to occupy for my corner of the editorial page. I hope that whoever reads this column comes away with some glimpse of initiative to expand their college experience in some way. I've been lucky to come across certain people in my life who pushed me to develop that initiative, and in the final words for this paper I would like to thank them.

Mom, Dad, Crystal: Family is indispensable.

Dave and Angela: Not only did your generosity help alleviate the financial burden associated with a college education, it motivated me to make the most of this experience and work as hard as possible to achieve my goals.

George W. Bush: Thank you for assuming the presidency in 2000 and invading Iraq in 2003. I would have never developed an interest in politics and government had it not been for your historically controversial and mismanaged presidency.

Joe Meloni: Thank you for finding Bulmers on tap in America.

Kimberly Hicks, Mark Clinton, Fred Cooksey, Mr. Francesco, Mr. Torrito: I owe you all a great deal of my personal development and academic success. I count you among the best instructors I have had throughout my academic career.

That's all I have to say. I must depart now, I need to get back to my thesis and the Bruins are on in 20 minutes.

The police state of Massachusetts

Sara Crossman

About a month ago my mother called me to tell me that my younger brother's friends got busted at a party by the police. I didn't think much of it because high school kids get in trouble for parties and underage drinking all the time, but then my mom told me that my hometown of Hudson, Mass., received a grant in December for the police department to put towards "monitoring" underage drinking.

Essentially, Hudson formed a party patrol to police the area and break up parties involving underage drinking. All the minor infractions that are part of growing up like underage drinking and throwing noisy parties that used to be taken care of by parents are now dealt with by the police.

When did it become a crime to grow up? Probably around the same time the University of Massachusetts started stationing police cadets in the dormitories. As every student has probably realized, there are police in the dorms on weekend nights either stationed for the night in one location or in rotation in several dorms. These officers are meant to increase safety and decrease underage drinking. But more often, they violate the rights of the students whose safety they claim to protect.

The Fourth Amendment protects against illegal search and seizure, yet many students have been searched without their permission or without the knowledge that they could refuse a search. To find out what students in general know, I asked a few students in the Lincoln Campus Center some general questions about their experiences with the officers in the dorms.

One junior who currently lives in Coolidge and who has always lived in Southwest says that she has had several interactions with police in the dorms. She told me that at one point last year she was moving groceries and water into her building one night and the officer stationed in her building followed her back out to her car and claimed that because her car was parked illegally, he could search it without a warrant. She said he was "searching for drugs or alcohol, but upon finding none, proceeded to try to thank me for my cooperation." I asked her why she didn't just tell him no. She said she didn't know she could.

Another student, a sophomore living in Cance, told me about an experience that he had trying to enter the dorm with a backpack after sign-in on a Friday night. He said it was right before midterms started and he was just trying to get work done before taking a break for the weekend. He came back from the library with his backpack full of books and notebooks and just wanted to go back to his room. An officer was in the building and asked him what was in his bag.

"Books," he replied. The officer asked if he could confirm that and the student said no. The officer then walked behind him and unzipped his bag and looked inside only to find books. The officer said he could go back to his room and acted like nothing strange had just happened.

"I was so pissed," he told me, but seemed to think there was nothing he could do about the officer's behavior.

Recently, I spoke with Patrick Archbald, deputy chief of UMass police over the phone. When I asked about cadets searching student bags, he was quite surprised that anyone would do so. Yet, it has been my experience and the experience of the two students I interviewed that the cadets do look in bags.

He said most students who are stopped really do not bother to hide the fact that they were bringing in alcohol.

"Someone under 21 and walking in with a case of beer is the most common scenario we see," said Archbald. "Stopping people with closed bags is not something that we do often. We take people's freedom to move around as they wish very seriously."

When did mistrust and a blatant disregard for students' rights become the norm at UMass and elsewhere in this country? I don't know. What I do know is that catching one student with a couple beers is more important to UMass than creating a sense of trust between students and the faculty, staff and police at this institution.

What I do know is that many students don't know their rights and that those who do feel too intimidated to say something about it. Unless we make more attempts to remain educated about our rights, we'll wind up living in 1984 or the Panopticon.

WHY EVEN PRINT IT?

Dear Editor,

RE: "Don't bail on government bailouts," By Subhan Tariq, May 5

I have to say that, as a fifth-year student here at the University of Massachusetts, I am disappointed with your choice to even print Subhan Tariq's article on May 5 titled "Don't bail on government bailouts."

I do not think there has been a day that I have been on campus and have not read the whole paper, cover to cover. While there are moments (I use moments because points would be too kind) that I agree with, the argument he brings forth is very poorly worded and frankly, not convincing one bit.

Tariq fails to differentiate the bailouts of major financial institutions and banks known by the newspaper-reading world as the Trouble Asset Relief Program (TARP), from the $787 billion stimulus package known as the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act of 2009. This is by no means a bailout of corporations and shouldn't even be grouped into the conversation unless you are looking at the increase of government spending as a whole.

Tariq also brings up the increase in Citigroup's stock and how this can or has benefited the country by making the government's share worth 300 percent more. With market volatility still high, the financial future still up in the air. And with Federal Reserve chairman Bernanke saying that the economy will continue to have large job losses, how is the government's share in the companies that's created this recession supposed to comfort me? These bailouts of corporations shouldn't have happened in the first place.

In 2008, these same executives were paid upwards of $32 billion dollars in bonus compensation while the housing crisis was about to be in full swing resulting in the largest drop in asset value for African-Americans ever. Where were their bailouts?

Yes, some of them shouldn't have bought homes in the first place; but, as millions were losing their homes, billions of dollars were being handed out to the country's richest and I should support and finance their plans with my hard-earned tax dollars?

If Tariq continues to write his columns, I would hope that he take more time and effort to write a piece of worry journalism. Submitting articles that looks like it was rushed to fill space on a page makes The Collegian look unprofessional when there are worthy journalists their to fill the pages with readable content, not just words.

WE'RE ALL PATRIOTS

Dear Editor,

As an avid reader of The Daily Collegian, I constantly find myself intrigued and impressed by the editorial page of the newspaper. Studying some journalism, I have found that opinionated pieces are the most interesting and conversational sections of the paper. However, I have never been so offended and disgraced by a piece until I read Andrew Prowten's article, entitled "Patriots' Day more than 4-20.".

In reading Prowten's work, I feel as if because I smoked pot on April 20, I am not proud to be an American. Because I exercised my rights as a U.S. citizen, I am not grateful for the sacrifice soldiers have made to grant me the freedom to smoke a blunt on the hill with my friends.

Part of the festivities on Monday was showing the movie "Half Baked" on the water towers, which Andrew somehow took offense to. Would he rather have aired "The Patriot" or "Black Hawk Down," so as to incite a massive conglomerate of students to sing "God Bless America" while waving American flags back and forth?

I had barely gotten halfway through the article before the apparent message was found: He thinks he is better than people who smoke pot. By heading back to Concord and watching old men dressed up like Paul Revere ride around yelling "The British are coming, the British are coming," he thinks he is more patriotic than everyone out on the hill on 4/20. He goes so far as to say our "ignorant actions" discredit the privileges we have, and to question whether we deserve to call ourselves Americans.

But of course, since he goes and watches reenactments and has a family history laced in battle, he is more of an American than me, the lazy pot smoker who is too high to care about anything. I am way too high to articulate an opinion on your poorly written editorial.

He asked, "have we forgotten how privileged we are as Americans" and claim people swear they are oppressed by the economy. But what struck me was the line, "I hate cops". That, sir, is utterly disgraceful and unappreciative. He must really hate not having to worry about killers and drug dealers running around the streets of great old Concord, terrorizing the public. He must hate being safe from harm and being protected by people who put their lives on the line everyday for your civil liberties.

As it is laid out in the First Amendment, we are allowed the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, so I cannot completely shut down Prowten. But, I can use that same freedom to critique it. Instead of coming off as an arrogant and ignorant "patriot" who questions the very fiber of our society, he should have stuck with a story about your brother's patriotism. Attacking pot smokers and labeling us as anti-American is incredibly offensive and unwarranted.

Patriotism is defined in the dictionary simply as "love for one's country." Nowhere does it say you must constantly be thanking everyone around you for your freedom. In fact, patriotism is measured by how you exercise the freedom given so you by the soldiers' sacrifice. Just as people celebrate holidays differently, we all show our own brand of patriotism. If Prowten took a moment and got down off his high horse, his eyes would be opened to this. And maybe, just maybe, he would consider me, the lazy and ignorant pot smoker, slightly more patriotic. Then again, I guess I could just join the army and then everyone would really believe me to be a patriot.

FIELDING A QUESTION

Dear Editor,

While I didn't support the liberal students' protest of Don Feder, after attending Dr. Mike Adams' recent lecture, I now find that the criticism campus liberals received make their detractors seem hypocritical.

The manner in which Adams handled his protestors worked against his stance. In response to the disruptive hissing at the beginning of his speech, he said, "Hiss if you wish your mother had an abortion."

When the hissing stopped, he said that he won. His sentiments exemplify the gross dichotomy created by pro-life rhetoric: that being pro-choice signifies pro-abortion. And by suggesting that our mothers conceived us under conditions that may have necessitated an abortion, he trivializes the reasons, many of which neither he nor I could possibly imagine, of why some women receive abortions.

Moreover, he immediately received applause and some laughter from supporters for this, showing that perhaps pro-life conservatives occasionally enjoy abortion jokes, but that doesn't mean Adams and his supporters are distasteful, right?

Even worse, Adams demonstrated the same intolerance and close-mindedness with which campus conservatives have branded liberals. He ostensibly claimed, "That's why it's so important to have a conversation on the opposite of an issue."

During the question and answer session, Adams naturally showed a clear bias against the pro-choice viewpoint. But more importantly, he disregarded his own advice and treated "questioners" inconsistently.

When the pro-life student in front of me stood up and made a comment toward the pro-choice advocates, he welcomed her thought and expanded on it. But immediately following her, when a pro-choice student spoke, he was agitated that she didn't ask a question and stated, "Since you're not going to ask me a question, I'll ask you a question." His attitude was obviously different, not like that of someone who would be having a "conversation" with a differing opinion.

The discrepancy in the instance above might not be too alarming to some, but the pro-choice student who asked the following questions was met with a completely absurd reaction.

For whatever reasons, Adams asserted that she was not asking him a question, when, in fact, she asked three distinct, well-organized and well-prefaced questions.

After the lecture, I calmly addressed the pro-choice student who had made the first comment and asked her if she supported this privileging of the conservative viewpoint in this type of forum. She responded, "Well that girl did ask a long question." She doesn't deny that she was treated differently and evidently supports a bias toward lengthy questions. After I exchanged some further comments with her and her friend, the latter snidely asked, "Huh, why are we talking to about this right now?" I reiterated my initial sentiments and walked away, but what I should've said was that, despite his comment about conversations with the other side, Adams clearly had no intentions of a dialogue, and from speaking with the two of them, nor did they.

My point in painting conservatives with the same brush they've used against liberals is not to persuade anyone from being pro-choice or pro-life, but rather to point out that, for the sake of being decent, everyone defecates, i.e., everyone's excrements stink.

Theatre Guild to 'Bare' all at FAC

UMass' own stage aficionados perform new show tonight

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

After months of rehearsing for five nights a week, the University of Massachusetts Theatre Guild premieres its spring musical, "Bare," Thursdays at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

The story of "Bare" centers around two roommates, Peter and Jason, at a private Catholic high school. The boys are secret lovers who struggle to come out, finding it especially difficult in the Catholic atmosphere of St. Cecilia's Boarding School.

Jason, as the popular "golden child" of the senior class, finds the task more daunting than Peter. The musical deals with difficult questions of whether the good in life can outweigh the challenges that Peter and Jason face.

"Bare" debuted at the Hudson Theatre in Los Angeles in 2000. Written by Damon Intrabartolo and John Hartmere, Jr., the show was also produced in New York.

Intrabartolo – who has worked as a composer on such films as "Lake Placid," "X2: X-Men United," "Fantastic Four" and "Superman Returns" – composed the music while Hartmere wrote the lyrics.

Other musicals composed by Intrabartolo include "Ann E. Wrecksick and the Odyssey of the Bulimic Orphans" and "Plop." Like "Bare," "Ann E. Wrecksick" debuted in Los Angeles, where Intrabartolo lives.

The choice to produce "Bare" comes from a voting process, in which every member of the Guild can participate.

"Anyone is able to nominate a show that they feel would be a beneficial production for the Guild to produce," said Ben Skinner, the show's publicity director. Skinner also plays Zack.

"They present the show through a series of detailed questions to the Guild's executive board and from there, depending on a series of criteria, the executive board chooses three to five shows to present to the voting body of the Guild ... at which point they are able to ask questions, make comments and have a discussion about the different shows," Skinner said. "After all has been discussed, the voting body votes. The musical and play that have a majority of the votes will be produced for the following semester."

Undergraduate students comprise the entire cast and artistic team of "Bare."

Being a part of the production is a serious commitment – the Guild began rehearsals the first week of February. Every week of this semester the students dedicated each Sunday-Thursday evening to the production.

Skinner estimated that there were "around 80" students vying for the 18 spaces in the cast of "Bare."

Director Ilana Toeplitz has past theater experience both on and off stage. She has performed in "Pippin," "The Boy Friend," "Babes in Arms," "Jesus Christ Superstar" and "Once on this Island," among others. She has previously directed "Lucky Stiff," a musical comedy based off Michael Butterworth's 1983 novel "The Man Who Broke the Bank at Monte Carlo."

Toeplitz takes theater and the arts seriously, as she is currently pursuing a major in "creative artistic direction, design and arts management" through UMass' bachelor's degree in an individual concentration program. Before this, she had been working toward a bachelor's of fine arts in musical theatre at the Boston Conservatory.

Many members of the artistic team have worked on Theatre Guild productions in the past, especially last semester's "Once on This Island." All have prior experience either on stage or behind the scenes.

"Bare" will be performed May 7, 8 and 9 at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. There will also be a matinee showing on Saturday, May 9 at 2 p.m. Tickets are $6 for students and seniors and $10 for general admission. They can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center box office.

UMass Theatre Guild members voted on performing the musical "Bare" for their spring performance. The Guild has been rehearsing since February for tonight's opening show.

Thermals warm NoHo

COURTESY THE THERMALS

The Thermals played to satisfied fans Tuesday night during an intimate show at the Pearl Street Nightclub, as they look forward to multiple festival appearances this summer.

Indie band shows its prowess at Pearl Street

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Portland, Ore., indie-rock power trio The Thermals have come a long way since the release of their last album, both literally and figuratively.

Three years since the release of "The Body, the Blood, the Machine," the band has become an indie favorite, embraced by the hype machine, with praise lavished upon them by Pitchfork and the Onion's A.V. Club, respectively.

With a new album in tow and a slate of festival appearances lined up for this summer, Tuesday night's show at the Pearl Street Basement saw The Thermals getting a chance to give something back. The band brought along a contingent of their Portland pals to open for them on the latest leg of touring in support of their new album, "Now We Can See."

Point Junction, WA opened up the show with a shifting, psychedelic vibe. The second opener, The Shaky Hands, offered another taste of northwestern sonic time travel with a number of twisting song structures harking back to a purer musical era.

When The Thermals finally walked on stage around 10 p.m., they immediately launched into the raw "I Might Need You to Kill," from "The Body, the Blood, the Machine."

"It's [expletive] Tuesday, its Cinco de Mayo," said guitarist and vocalist Hutch Harris, gesturing towards the large lime-colored cactus balloons that the band had brought on stage for the occasion. "Quite the fiesta, huh?"

With a howl like The Mountain Goats' John Darnielle and a skinny, uncomfortable frame reminiscent of a young David Byrne, Harris seems right at home on stage. For most of the show, however, there was a lack of stage banter, with Harris and the rest of The Thermals preferring instead to pound through their short blasts of lo-fi rock one after another, as if possessed by an urge to shred eardrums.

Harris' lack of chattiness could have been due to the light crowd of less than 100 in the Pearl Street Basement on Tuesday night. Attendance clearly was affected by cold rain, and the upcoming rush of finals, as the Five Colleges prepare to close for the summer.

Harris, bassist Kathy Foster and drummer Westin Glass certainly have a tight feel for their songs, after touring nearly non-stop since the release of their last album. The band tore through a mix of 2006 and 2009 material at a rapid-fire pace, with their dynamics generally going from loud to louder. After playing "How We Know" and "Back to Grey," The Thermals attacked the fan favorite "Pillar of Salt," which got the audience gyrating.

A few minor problems in the mixing of the guitars affected the first couple songs, but by the middle of the set these issues seemed to have been resolved, for the most part.

Harris largely eschewed guitar heroics in favor of churning power chords, and the rest of the band tended to agree with his focus on simplicity. The band chewed through 2006's "St. Rosa and the Swallows" and "Here's Your Future" with ease, along with newer songs such as "You Dissolve," and their new single "Now You Can See."

Harris' lyrics often emerge as cult-like chants and shouts, incorporating religious symbolism and social critique along with more typical indie fare — relationships and self-defeat.

"God reached his hand down from the sky / God asked Noah if he wanted to die /He said, no sir, oh, no sir! / God said, Here's your future ... It's gonna rain ..." sings Harris in "Here's Your Future." "So we're packing our things / We're building a boat / We're gonna create the new master race / 'Cause we're so pure, oh Lord we're so pure..." While not exactly heretical, the song's lyrics certainly don't aim to bring smiles to the faces of the devout.

After hammering out the older song "No Culture Icons," Harris announced that the next song would be their last. True to their word, following "It's Trivia," The Thermals put down their instruments and walked off stage. With a bravado normally reserved for more grandiose acts, The Thermals declined to give an encore, despite the determined shouts of those demanding more, even after the lights came on.

It remains to be seen if Harris and the rest of The Thermals can live up to the hefty hype that they've garnered thus far. However, their Pearl Street performance certainly proved that, when focused, they can pile drive their way through a set list with a fury quite uncommon in indie circles these days.

'Billy Elliott' leads Tony nods

Trent Kowalik stars as Billy Elliott in the British Musical "Billy Elliott: The Musical." He plays a young boy who aspires to be a ballet dancer in Northeast England.

Strong acting fields are most competitive

By Charles McNulty
Los Angeles Times

A glut of great acting talent and a scarcity of distinguished new plays and musicals – the Tony nominations for the 2008-09 season, announced Tuesday morning, reveal that the more things change in this period of economic hard times, the more they stay commercially the same.

No surprise that "Billy Elliot: The Musical," the Lee Hall-Elton John juggernaut, pulled in a record-tying 15 nominations, with the three tykes alternating in the title role sharing a crack at the award for leading actor in a musical. Might as well roll out the red carpet and hand the production its brica-brac right now. The suspense over whether this overstuffed, overpraised British import will receive single- or double-digit awards isn't exactly killing anyone. The Tony crown, whose gilt seems to be peeling more and more each year, has all but been bestowed on "Billy Elliot."

Prognosticators were also fairly certain that "Next to Normal," a musical that dares to tackle the subject of bipolar disorder, would clinch one of the four best musical spots. One nominee has to shore up the category's serious credentials, if not integrity, and this production boasts a performance by Alice Ripley that's favored to grab the best leading actress in a musical award.

Somewhat surprising was the absence from the best musical category of "9 to 5: The Musical," that giant dollop of movie-inspired comfort food specially prepared by Dolly Parton, one of the film's stars, and Patricia Resnick, the woman behind the original screenplay. When the show premiered in September, it struck me as an attraction for audiences that "just want to have nostalgic fun," no matter that the production has "only occasional success in switching on the old fluorescent-lit office magic."

Nothing gets in the way of a musical megalith and its Broadway dreams – certainly not out-of-town mixed reviews. But it shouldn't be too hard to wrap your mind around the illogic of the gamble when you consider the two shows that wound up squeezing "9 to 5: The Musical" out of the category: "Shrek the Musical," marking DreamWorks' less-than-heralded plunge into what traditionally have been Disney waters, and "Rock of Ages," the jerky '80s jukebox joy ride that had its world premiere three years ago in Hollywood and seemed destined back then for Vegas (where it briefly played) rather than the Great White Way.

Ah, distinctions, distinctions. The Tony nominating committee members have had no choice but to become connoisseurs of Happy Meals, differentiating among burgers and fries as they wipe the grease from their upper lips. But don't cry for Parton, whose score was nominated (and is fated to lose to John's) Blockbusters with a theme-parkish hook have a way of financially prevailing, come critical rain or even Tony cloud cover.

The good news concerning the best play category is that three of the four nominated works are by Americans, with nary an Englishman or Irishman in sight. The bad news is that Horton Foote's "Dividing the Estate," Neil LaBute's "Reasons to Be Pretty" and Moises Kaufman's "33 Variations" don't stand a chance against French playwright Yasmina Reza's "God of Carnage," whose entire cast (Marcia Gay Harden, Hope Davis, Jeff Daniels and James Gandolfini) was lavished with lead actor nominations and whose ensemble brilliance went a long way toward making Reza's schematic manipulations not just theatrically robust but almost human.

What would we do without the deft reliability of our actors? If not enough of us are sounding the Cassandra alarms this Broadway season, it has everything to do with their astounding quality.

Oscar winners, such as Jane Fonda ("33 Variations") and Geoffrey Rush ("Exit the King"), were rewarded as expected with nominations in the leading actor and actress categories. Other notable nods include ones for Stockard Channing ("Pal Joey") and Allison Janney ("9 to 5: The Musical") for leading actress in a musical, Raul Esparza (and not his "Speed-the-Plow" costar Jeremy Piven) for leading actor in a play, and Angela Lansbury ("Blithe Spirit") and Hallie Foote ("Dividing the Estate") for featured actress in play.

The most competitive contest this year was best revival of a play, with "Joe Turner's Come and Gone," "Mary Stuart," "The Norman Conquests," and "Waiting for Godot" beating out "The Seagull," "Exit the King," "All My Sons" and "Desire Under the Elms." Classics brought to life by brilliant pros are a bankable phenomenon. Even Friedrich Schiller's 1800 historical drama "Mary Stuart" can become an un-musty must-see when performed by actors of the caliber of Harriet Walter and Janet McTeer, who fittingly enough (given their roles), are up against each other in the leading actress category.

Meanwhile, British directors can duke it out over the hardware: "Billy Elliot's" Stephen Daldry appears to have a lock on the best direction of a musical award, but only Bartlett Sher ("Joe Turner's Come and Gone"), the lone American director, has a fighting chance against Phyllida Lloyd ("Mary Stuart") and Matthew Warchus (nominated for both "God of Carnage" and "The Norman Conquests").

Offense top priority

as well. We won't do the same thing all day defensively."

Princeton is strong offensively with six players having more than 20 points. Attackers Jack McBride (34 goals, seven assists) and Tommy Davis (25 goals, 16 assists) lead the Tigers in points.

"They have a great team concept on offense and great team concept on defense. They have the ability of finish the ball really, really well. They have six sharp shooters out there at once. And their attack is excellent."

On Sunday, UMass needs to score. The Minutemen have a similar game plan to what they wanted to do against Syracuse on April 25 (10-3 loss).

"If teams shut you down for too long you'll be out of the game that's just the way it goes. Especially with a good team like Princeton," Cannella said. "You have to score early, you have to score through 60, at least keep up with them."

Princeton and UMass have faced seven of the same opponents this season including Rutgers, Syracuse, Brown, Hofstra, Albany, Harvard and Yale. Princeton went 6-1 against common foes, while UMass went 3-4. The Tigers' lone loss came against Hofstra.

"They lost to Hofstra and they lost to Cornell. You view those tapes and try to use some of what those teams did against them to come out on top, as well as some of [Princeton's] close wins. It was a tie game in the third quarter against Yale and Harvard loses to them by a goal," said Cannella.

"There are some common opponents that you feel you competed with that maybe helps [the players] more than us [coaches]. We're nervous all the time when you watch tape. For these guys some say you know 'oh we played these guys pretty tough we can compete," he said.

The winner of Sunday's game will advance to the quarterfinals at Hofstra on May 16 to face the winner of the Cornell-Hofstra game.

The keys to a UMass victory

They'll both need hat tricks (at least) with some serious help from their teammates.

RELISH THE "UNDERDOG FACTOR"

"I'm sure Doc will touch on that, he always does," joked Connolly. "That's how we got here. We're the underdogs – that's why we came to UMass in the first place. We relish the role."

The Minutemen have been using that motivation all-year long. In fact, that is in many ways the foundation of the UMass men's lacrosse program.

"No doubt, [the program] is built that whether you're a favorite or an underdog, you're still going to work your tail off," said Cannella. "Many times this year, we weren't the underdog, so you feel that a little bit. And now we are so you got to relish that role, take advantage of that and I think that's what this program is all about."

Many of the players have talked about how they aren't as highly-recruited as players from schools like Syracuse and Princeton. They always go out there to prove that they belong on the same field with any team in the country.

Motivation is never a problem for a team coach by Cannella, but a little extra motivation never hurt anyone.

UTILIZE LEADERSHIP AND EXPERIENCE

UMass' seniors have been here before. Led by Schneider, the Minutemen made the national championship game in 2006. They haven't been back to the postseason since. It will be the job of the seniors to lead by example and get the younger kids ready to go.

"A couple of them have spoke up already about preparation and hopefully some of the younger guys are listening and hopefully they can settle some of the young guys down if they're too excited on Sunday," Cannella said.

GET GOOD GOALKEEPING

Minutewomen look forward to upset bid

W. LACROSSE from page 8

goals, 26 assists) are four shy of the UMass single season record.

Whether the offense can play at that level against the Wildcats' defense, which holds opponents to an average of 6.53 goals per game, second in the NCAA, remains to be seen.

One of the keys to the Minutewomen pulling off the upset will be winning the draw. Northwestern is used to controlling the draw circle winning 315 draw controls against 174 opposing wins. NU uses that advantage to go on large scoring runs without allowing the opponent to touch the ball.

Reddy has been the top player on the draw for UMass setting an Atlantic 10 record for most draw controls with 77. Reddy and teammate Holly Drown (43 draw controls) have to be competitive in the circle.

"If we can take the draw from [NU] I think we can take them out of the game," Drown said. "I think they'd get a little rattled if we gave them a nice battle on the draw because they are used to winning them all the time."

The Minutewomen know they will have their hands full on defense again. The Wildcats average an NCAA-leading 17.58 goals per game, their leading scorer Hannah Nielson leads the nation in points scored with 122.

Nielson scored four goals and assisted on four more against the Minutewomen in their first meeting, and UMass cannot allow a repeat performance if it wants to stay competitive.

"I think defensively we are in a lot better shape to force outside shots," Florence said. "I will know more about what to expect from their shooters and I think playing them [already] will help us.

There will be a lot of pressure on Florence to keep UMass competitive. Florence made 11 saves in the first game against Northwestern, a good number against most teams, but not against the Wildcats who average 33.9 shots each contest.

UMass understands that almost no one seems to gives it a chance to beat Northwestern, but Venechanos is looking forward to the challenge.

"I think this is fun. It's exciting, I think we're approaching it like we're going to the biggest show and [we're playing] against the best," Venechanos said. "This is a great opportunity for us to show the improvement we have made since the last time we've played them."

Venechanos familiar with foe

ing, she was the goalie coach; she was in charge of the defense; she had a lot of responsibilities; we only had three coaches so everyone shared responsibility," Amonte Hiller said. "She did a great job spearheading that recruiting."

The two met back when Venechanos was still in college, where she was the starting goalkeeper for Maryland. Amonte Hiller, who had played at and graduated from Maryland in 1996, held a number of training camps that Venechanos attended. The two shared the common experience of playing on a national championship team in Maryland. Amonte Hiller won national titles in 1995 and 1996 while Venechanos won them in 2000 and 2001 – the pair bonded quickly.

"I think the alumni of Maryland are a pretty tight-knit group," Amonte Hiller said. "We try to keep in close contact and I just became friends with Lex right out of that."

"We definitely have a lot of pride in the [Maryland] program and I think that pride bonds us, we were all coached by the same coach [Cindy Timchal] and we all have similar experiences," Amonte Hiller continued.

When Venechanos was a senior about to graduate college in 2003 Amonte Hiller had an opening on the Northwestern staff. She called Venechanos who gladly accepted her offer. Together, they transformed a team that had been a club sport as recently as 2001, into a national powerhouse.

Along the way, Venechanos learned a great deal about how to build a program, how to recruit players and create a winning attitude. These are all lessons that helped Venechanos coach the Minutewomen to the NCAA Tournament for the first time in 25 years, in just her third year as head coach.

The two coaches have stayed in close contact since Venechanos left the program. They call each other every week, and have talked with each other in the week leading up to Sunday's game.

"[We talk] about our programs. Alexis often calls to get advice and well we're friends; we talk about everything," Amonte Hiller said.

One major difference between the coaches is their chosen preparation. UMass has talked a great deal about Northwestern's style; it has watched film off its 22-5 defeat on March 25 and are trying to fine tune its gameplan.

Meanwhile, Northwestern has been focusing on improving its own play and hasn't yet discussed the Minutewomen.

"We don't really talk about the other team; we just get a gameplan of what we want to execute and how we are going to defend them," Amonte Hiller said.

The two coaches will remain friends regardless of the outcome of the game; but only one coach can advance, the other can only smile and say "good luck in the next round."

Another chance at Fordham

Instead of facing Saint Joseph's, against whom UMass fared well in two victories in the regular season, the Minutewomen will take on a team that's not intimidated and is unwilling to back down.

"Everybody is going to be tough. Everybody is going to play us tough. They did earlier in the year and they are going to now," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "There are no weak sisters in this tournament."

In their matchup this year, the Minutewomen split their doubleheader with the Rams to end the regular season, winning the first game of the series, 4-0, before falling 5-4 in the two-game series finale.

In the first game, senior Brandice Balschmiter (28-4) provided an impressive one-hit complete-game shutout, striking out 13 batters and allowing only one base runner on an infield single.

Balschmiter also pitched six innings of relief in the second game.

Junior Sarah Reeves supplied the offense for the Minutewomen, going 2-for-3 with an RBI and a run scored.

However, Fordham snapped UMass' 54-game regular season home winning streak with the victory in the series finale. The last time the Minutewomen lost a home game was back on April 9, 2006 when UMass dropped a 2-1 loss to Charlotte.

Junior Bailey Sanders (1-3) struggled in her outing, taking the loss after allowing four runs on four hits and two walks in only one-plus inning of work.

For Fordham, sophomore Beckah Wiggins and senior Melissa Andrews both homered to give the Rams their first ever win in Amherst.

If UMass can pull out the victory against the Rams, it will face the winner of the No. 2 Charlotte (32-14, 14-4 A-10) vs. No. 3 Saint Louis (31-21, 12-6 A-10) matchup on Friday at 1 p.m.

"Our goal is our conference title. That is our goal," Sortino said before leaving Tuesday for the Tournament. "We've worked very, very hard to position ourselves to get to the conference championship, that is always our goal, and now it is to win it."

UMass will depend on Joe Reale, above, and Anthony Toresco in the face-off circle in its first round game against Princeton. Reale struggled in the circle in UMass' last game against Rutgers.

The Minutewomen take on undefeated Northwestern in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. The Wildcats are the four-time defending national champions.

Minutemen strive for 6th consecutive 1st round victory

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Think of it as any other game.

That's what Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella has been telling his team all season.

This Sunday, though, it's hard to not think of the game as any other game. UMass will travel to New Jersey to play Princeton in the first round of the NCAA Tournament at 5 p.m.

The Minutemen (9-5, 6-1 ECAC) earned their way into the 16-team tournament last weekend after defeating Rutgers, 11-10, in overtime to win the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championship. This is UMass' 18th tournament appearance and its first since 2006 when the Minutemen lost to Virginia in the championship game.

"[The senior class is] the only group that has experience in the NCAA Tournament. A couple of them have spoke up already about preparation and hopefully some of the younger guys are listening and then those guys can settle some of the young guys down if they are too excited on Sunday," Cannella said.

Cannella has prepared his team for each game the same way and has trained them not think of games like Sunday's differently from any other game out of the season.

"Its always exciting playing games like this. This will be the seventh time that we're doing it. You learn to stay composed and make sure your guys see you composed," Cannella said. "I remember one game I was very nervous, and we played that way."

UMass has won five consecutive first round NCAA games under Cannella. The last time the Minutemen lost a first round game was in 1995, Cannella's first year as coach. The 11-6 loss came against Princeton. UMass has faced Princeton one other time, an 11-9 loss in the second round of the 1997 NCAA Tournament.

No. 4 Princeton (12-2) failed to reach the tournament last season and tied Cornell this season in the Ivy League Championship.

Out of the teams that UMass has played this season, Princeton is most comparable to Syracuse. They both play a running game – Princeton isn't as big as Syracuse, but faster.

"[Princeton is] really pushing transitions the best they can and playing patiently in 6-on-6 when they get it. [They are] very, very solid on the defensive end," Cannella said. "We'll change some things up as the game moves along

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team accomplished the improbable this season by returning to the NCAA Tournament for the first time since 1984.

Now the Minutewomen must accomplish the seemingly impossible – topple a dynasty.

This Sunday the Minutewomen (11-7) will travel to Chicago for a rematch against undefeated, No. 1 ranked, top-seeded, four-time defending national champion Northwestern (19-0) in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. The game starts at 2 p.m.

"We're underdogs, nobody expects us to win," goalkeeper Katie Florence said. "It's going to be fun for us because we have nothing to lose. We just can go out there, play with an attitude and hopefully pull off the upset."

The Wildcats played UMass earlier this season defeating the Minutewomen 22-5 on March 25. Meghan Reddy led the way for the Minutewomen with a hat trick, but five players recorded three goals or more for Northwestern.

UMass does have the advantage of familiarity against Northwestern, not only have the Minutewomen seen how NU plays firsthand; their coaching staff has insider knowledge.

Venechanos and current UMass assistant Acacia Walker both won NCAA titles as assistant coaches for Northwestern coach Kelly Amonte Hiller. Venechanos was there from 2005-07 while Walker was there from 2005-08.

"Our coaches know that team better than any other coaches do, so they are going to have all the strategies," Reddy said. "They are going to prepare us the best way possible and all we have to do is execute what they say."

No team ever wants to lose by 17 goals, but in some ways that game helped catapult UMass into the NCAA Tournament. Since that humbling loss, which dropped them to a 3-6 record, UMass went 8-1, capturing its first Atlantic 10 Championship since 2000.

"Our attack is different, we've played a lot more games since we've played them and we've grown a lot as a team," senior defender Jackie Rosenzweig said.

The Minutewomen's offense has improved dramatically since the start of conference play, averaging 14.3 goals per game including the A-10 Tournament. The attack is led by Jackie Lyons, whose 70 points (44

Heading into Sunday's NCAA Selection Show, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella thought his team would draw Cornell in the first round. An Ivy League team they got, but it wasn't the Big Red.

Instead, the Minutemen will head to New Jersey for a meeting with fourth-seeded Princeton in the opening round of the NCAAs. Either way, Cannella knew his team had their work cut out for them.

"We knew we were going to play someone tough," he said with a tentative laugh, knowing no matter who they got it was going to be an elite team.

Princeton certainly qualifies. The talented Tigers have won games over some of the best teams in the country – including Syracuse (No.1), Johns Hopkins (No. 7), UMBC (No. 9), Brown (No. 12) and Harvard (No. 19). Against teams currently in the Top 20, UMass has beaten Harvard, Loyola (No. 15) and Penn State (No. 16), but lost to Syracuse, Brown and No. 10 Hofstra. And the latter two games (both decided by one goal) could have gone UMass' way.

Those wins were nice for UMass, but there's a major difference between teams ranked No. 15 and teams in the Top 5 in Division I lacrosse. Take Syracuse for example, which completely dominated the Minutemen, 10-3, back on April 25 at McGuirk Stadium. Princeton is one of the most elite programs in the country, as evidenced by the teams it has beaten this season.

UMass has nine wins, won its conference championship and has a battle-tested coach, one of the best 1-2 combinations at attack and arguably the best goalkeeper in the country, Doc Schneider. The Minutemen can compete with any team in the country because of these factors, and have a better chance than most of the experts are giving them.

The talent is there to pull off that upset, but almost all of the following will have to go UMass' way come Sunday to do it...

Win the face-off battle

That has been a problem for UMass this season. And if that problem pops up against Princeton, look out. The Tigers love to run on offense and can score in a hurry after winning a draw.

How well Joe Reale, pictured, does on faceoffs against Princeton could go a long way in a potential UMass upset.

P.J. STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Senior midfielder Evan Blum, pictured, and others will have to step up this weekend in support of offensive stars Jim Connolly and Tim Balise.

The key here is Joe Reale. The senior has taken the majority of the face-offs this season, but has had major struggles. He's won just 106 of his 242 face-offs, which is less than 44 percent. If he struggles early, Cannella will have to make a change.

"We're going to stick with Joe to begin with and see how he's doing and then we can use Anthony Toresco, who proved himself the other day," Cannella said before practice Wednesday. "And it's about matchups on the face-offs, too, depending on who's out there. We're going to play that as it goes."

If it wasn't for Toresco, UMass may not even be in the NCAA Tournament. He won 11 crucial face-offs in the overtime victory over Rutgers, while Reale lost all but two of his seven tries.

Find a third scorer

This has been elusive at times for the Minutemen. Jim Connolly (35 goals) and Tim Balise (30) have accounted for 47.8 percent of the 136 goals UMass has scored this season. It's good for the team to have two dynamic scorers, but they are often too reliant on them offensively to win games.

"We are urging some players to step up. And we're going to need someone else besides Jim and Tim, that's for sure," Cannella said.

Take that to heart Bobby Hayes (11), Art Kell (11), Rory Pedrick (12) and Evan Blum (13) – the four players that are the most capable of taking some of the scoring load off of Connolly and Balise.

They all know how important this will be on Sunday.

"We're going to have to have everybody step up and have a big game – just to take some pressure off of Jim and Tim, because Princeton is going to be keying up to stop them because they've had such great games the past couple weeks," Hayes said.

Check out the production of Balise and Connolly in UMass' nine wins: 51 of the 99 goals, 5.6 goals per game. In the five losses? They have a total of 14 goals.

UM hopes to give Wildcats 1st loss of 2009 campaign

By Scott Feldman

In order for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse to advance to the second round, it will have to get past the best collection of lacrosse players in the country – a group that their own coach helped assemble.

Before Alexis Venechanos became the coach at UMass, she spent three years working under arguably the greatest current coach in lacrosse, Kelly Amonte Hiller. Now she will face her old boss and current friend in the 2009 NCAA Tournament.

Venechanos tries to downplay the history that she had at Northwestern, claiming they are just another opponent.

"Once the game starts it doesn't matter who we're playing against," Venechanos said.

Venechanos was the assistant coach alongside Amonte Hiller from 2004-06 before taking the job with UMass. She was instrumental in recruiting many of the players that have helped the Wildcats be so dominant, having won the last four national championships. In addition to helping out with just about every other aspect of the team.

"She was involved in recruit-

Class survey looks at UMass, UMyths

By Lisa DeBenedictis
Collegian Staff

At the University of Massachusetts, or perhaps the more aptly named "ZooMass" as it has come to be known by some of its students, an association with heavy partying has long held hands with the University's reputation.

The students of professor Ekra Miezan's 497xx communications class thought so too when they chose to conduct a survey-based study on the factors that affect UMass students' academic performance, in the form of grade point average (GPA).

Surveying 248 students across the campus, the class asked them about attendance habits, studying habits, credit load, whether or not they worked to pay for college, the type of work they do, sleeping habits, what kind of extracurricular activities they are a part of, their soci-economic background, the type and location of their high schools, how much free time they have, love relationships and drug and alcohol use.

At the end of the survey, the students participating included their GPA, and the class measured which factors correlated positively and negatively to them.

The result, which came as a surprise to some of the class, was that rather than alcohol and drug use, class attendance and attending class on time were the two greatest factors in how high of a GPA the students surveyed had.

Their data revealed that students who answered the survey as "Barely Attending" class had an average GPA of 2.77, while those who answered as "Regularly Attending" had an average GPA of 3.25. Similarly, the students who answered as arriving "Late to Class" had an average GPA of 2.76, while those who answered as arriving "Regularly on time to Class" had an average GPA of 3.21.

However, alcohol and drug use did not have as high an influence on the participating students' GPA's, although it did affect them slightly. Students who answered as "Barely Drinking" had an average GPA of 3.24, and students who responded as drinking "Frequently" had a slightly lower GPA of 3.17.

Students surveyed about drug use who responded as using drugs "Not at all" had an average GPA of 3.23, those who responded as using drugs "Sometimes" had an average GPA of 3.15 and those who responded as "Definitely using" drugs had an average GPA of 2.99.

On the results of the survey, the students in Miezan's class who conducted the survey had several reactions.

"I was surprised at the results, because of the effects that drugs have on the brain," said Shane McEwen, of the lack of effect that drug and alcohol use had on student's GPAs.

Stacey Burgess, another member of the class, suggested that the age of the students surveyed may have also played a role in alcohol and drug users' lack of influence on their GPA.

"We had a lot of seniors in the survey… about half of the people surveyed were juniors and seniors, and they may be more grown up and more mature [about drug and alcohol use], rather than freshman and sophomores who come to UMass thinking of it as a party school," explained Burgess.

While some of Miezan's students were surprised at the results, many of them agreed that it makes sense that actual classroom habits do play the largest role, attributing the largest factor of academic success as the ability to balance one's schedule between studying and leisure time.

"I feel like coming to UMass, you want to do well but you want to balance the two. The school is known for its drinking and behaviors," said John Daniels, another student in the class.

"It's all about self control. You have the choice to say yes or no," added Andrew Moore, another student in Miezan's class.

Indeed, of the students surveyed, about 82 percent of students indicated that they "frequently or almost always" attend class, while about 18 percent of students surveyed indicated that they "barely attend."

"From some of the classes I go to, I thought it [the amount of students who don't attend] would be higher. Especially the larger lectures, they are easier to skip because the teacher doesn't know your face," said Daniels.

"It also goes along with general education courses," said Jamie Zelen, another student in the class. "They have nothing to do with your major, and at the beginning of the semester they start out full, but pretty soon, people stop going and the only time they are full are when its time to take an exam."

Many of the students in the class suggested that when it comes to large lecture style classes, whatever the professor can to do make students come, they should, such as taking attendance, using PRS or not putting the notes online. But ultimately, it is up to students to come to class and do the work.

"It's not the professor's job to get you to come to class," said Daniels.

Other correlations that significantly affected GPA included the more free time students had, the lower their GPA, if a student was involved with an extracurricular activity, the higher their GPA, if a student worked and helped to contribute to the payment of their education, their GPA was higher (although fully contributing or not contributing at all to the cost of their education both correlated to lower GPA's) and the older a student was, the better their GPA. Female students surveyed also tended to have slightly higher GPA's, while also having much less free time than male students surveyed.

Burgess explained that the class decided to conduct the survey because it could relate to all UMass students, and they hoped that the results would help students to learn how to do well in college.

"How you do in college has a lot to do with you," said Suzie Jozkowski, another member of the class, on the overall results of the survey.

Emerald Isle Pres. to speak at MHC

By Jon Peterson
Collegian Correspondent

Mary McAleese, Ireland's eighth and current president, will be delivering the commencement address to Mt. Holyoke College's graduating class on Sunday, May 24 during the school's 172nd commencement.

"We are honored to have President McAleese as commencement speaker," said Joanne Creighton, the president of Mt. Holyoke College, in a release. "In overcoming discrimination and adversity in Belfast and in rising to become a leader of the Irish people she exemplifies all that we hope for in Mount Holyoke students: leadership and a commitment to purposeful engagement in the world. Many in Massachusetts, with our longstanding ties to Ireland, will look forward to her remarks with great anticipation."

McAleese was elected for her first term in 1997 and her second in 2004. The Belfast native is the county's first president to hail from the embattled northern region, and she matured during the country's period of religiously motivated angst, known as "The Troubles."

The progressively leaning politician has high approval ratings and is also known outside her country for her human rights work.

Former addresses include one at Villanova University in Pennsylvania where she was protested by religious conservatives. This was due to her adherence to Roman Catholicism, while spending time and effort working to promote privacy rights for homosexuals in her country. Many viewed this as hypocritical and not in line with the religion's views.

Two other notable figures will be receiving degrees. Princess Lolowah al-Faisal al Saud, who founded the first private women's university in Saudi Arabia, Effat University, and award winning biochemist Clare Waterman.

Lolowah al-Faisal Saud, in addition to being princess of Saudi Arabia and the general supervisor of Effat University, is also Co-Chair of the World Economic Forum Community of West and Islam Dialogue. Mount Holyoke currently has strong ties with the University, as its administrators and faculty played key roles in its development. Both universities are currently part of the Women's Education Worldwide, an international grouping of women's schools.

Clare Waterman is a tenured associate professor at the Kellogg School of Science and Technology at The Scripps Research Institute. She graduated from Mt. Holyoke in 1989, received her master's degree from the University of Massachusetts and her Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. She has received multiple awards, including the Director's Pioneer award from the National Institutes of Health. She is an Established Investigator for the American Heart Association and is the current chief of the Laboratory of Cell and Tissue Morphodynamics at the NIH's National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute.

Paper or tote bag?

Local stores ditch the plastic to 'green' their image

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

They can take over 1,000 years to decompose and are among the most common debris items found in coastal cleanup operations.

Yet over 380 billion plastic bags, sacks and wraps are consumed by American shoppers each year, according to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Of that, only about one percent of plastics are recycled annually.

In response to these concerns, supermarket retailers nationwide are urging shoppers to replace plastic bags with reusable totes made from nylon, cotton canvas, hemp, woven polypropylene or recycled plastic.

"It's one of those easy, feel-good things. It's like, 'I can't do those big things like buy a hybrid car, but I can do these sorts of little green things,'" said Vincent Cobb, founder of Reusablebags.com, in a recent interview with Melissa Hecksher of The Los Angeles Daily News.

Typical plastic bags, made from high density polyethylene and petroleum, break down into smaller particles before their eventual absorption into soil and waterways, according to the EPA. This can present a danger to animals – particularly to birds and marine mammals – that often mistake particles of plastic for food.

Reusable tote bags provide an eco-friendly alternative for shoppers. Typically available in supermarkets and retail stores from 50 cents to $2.99 per bag, one reusable tote has the potential to replace nearly 1,000 plastic bags over its lifetime, according to The Boston Globe – but that is only if shoppers can remember to use them.

"I'm always leaving the bag in my car, and then I'll be out shopping, and I'll remember that I was supposed to bring it in," said Rachel Beaulieu, a senior at the University of Massachusetts.

Beaulieu purchased a reusable tote bag from Trader Joe's in an effort to "go green," but now says that cutting plastic bags out of her life hasn't been so simple.

"I'm used to bags being inside the store. I hate leaving in the middle of shopping just to grab a bag, so most of the time I usually don't bother using it," said Beaulieu.

Supermarket retailers have created incentive programs intended to help shoppers like Beaulieu learn to incorporate reusable tote bags into their regular shopping routines.

Trader Joe's spokeswoman Alison Mochizuki, said in an e-mail that the store's BYOB [Bring Your Own Bag] program offers shoppers the chance to win free Trader Joe's groceries and gift cards.

While the practice of carrying reusable tote bags has burgeoned in recent years, it has also grown pricier as many high-end fashion retailers have moved to capitalize on the eco-friendly trend.

In 2007, Hermes designed Silky Pop, a canvas tote bag made of organic silk material, which retails for $960. At Barney's New York, shopper's totes made from organic and hemp material range in price from $250 to $495 per bag.

Carrying reusable tote bags can be a fashion statement for some shoppers, but others seem altogether turned off by the idea of having to pay for a shopping bag.

"A reusable tote bag is just a fancy name for a shopping bag you have to pay for," said UMass sophomore Chris Lowe. "They're a complete waste. You're going to buy them once and forget about them, and then you're going to have to go to the store and buy more. You're paying for your shopping bag – it's insane," he said.

Yet in 2008, Massachusetts shoppers faced that threat anyway after Sen. Brian A. Joyce proposed a tax on all plastic bags used within the state. Under Sen. Joyce's proposed legislation, shoppers would have paid two cents per plastic bag used, with a gradual increase to 15 cents by 2013.

Although the legislation was ultimately rejected, Massachusetts isn't the only state to consider stamping a tax on plastic bags. According to The New York Times, states like Connecticut, Maryland, Washington, Texas and Virginia have all considered plastic bag taxes, but to date, no tax has been levied.

Advocates have had more success in banning plastic from retail stores. In 2007, San Francisco became the first city in the United States to ban plastic bags, with Los Angeles and Oakland, Calif., following.

Whole Foods Market blazed a similar trail in 2008 after it eliminated plastic bags from stores nationwide, switching instead to reusable tote bags and paper bags made from recycled fibers. In a recent statement, Whole Foods Market reported that sales for reusable tote bags have tripled in the last year.

"At first we wondered if shoppers would just switch to paper, but to our great surprise, people have been truly excited about using reusable bags," said A.C. Gallo, co-president and chief operating officer for Whole Foods Market, in the release.

Despite the popularity of reusable tote bags, not all bids to ban plastic bags have been successful. Last October, Plymouth, Mass., rejected a measure to ban plastic bags from retail stores, according to Wicked Local Plymouth.

The ban was opposed by the Massachusetts Food Association (MFA), which represents over 500 local and chain supermarket retailers, including Shaw's, Stop & Shop, Market Basket and Big Y.

"Supermarkets are doing a lot already. They already recycle all shrink wrap and cardboard," said MFA President Christopher Flynn. "Local bans and taxes [on plastic bags] are not the way to go right now."

Currently more than 1.5 billion plastic and paper bags are distributed per year in Massachusetts supermarkets, according to the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection (MassDEP).

In March, the MFA joined with MassDEP in an initiative to reduce the distribution of plastic and paper bags in the state by 33 percent by 2013.

According to Flynn, supermarkets will seek to reduce plastic bag use by educating the public further about the benefits of recycling plastic.

"We'll be working to train checkers to make sure they're letting consumers know about the different kinds of bags there are and asking consumers what kind of bags they want," said Flynn.

While a majority of Massachusetts supermarkets already offer in-store recycling programs to collect plastic shopping bags and other materials, as a result of the initiative, MFA-member supermarkets will expand their in-store recycling programs, said Flynn.

"Most people go shopping at least once or twice a week – since they're going anyway, [in-store recycling centers] are a way to get people to recycle more," he said.

But some recyclers remain skeptical about plastic recycling and have raised questions about the integrity of past in-store supermarket recycling programs.

"It's easy for supermarkets to say they have a [plastic bag] drop-off program," said John Pepi, general manager of UMass Waste Management.

Although supermarket recycling programs offer convenience for shoppers seeking to get rid of their plastic bags, supermarkets can sometimes mislead consumers about their intent to recycle, said Pepi.

"They may all recycle now, but some supermarkets in the past have come under suspicion for their drop-off programs. Some would just take [the bags] out of people's hands and wouldn't recycle them," he said.

FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" – SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

Saturday night "shopping"

Daniel Shwartz

When I landed my spot in a house only minutes from campus I was ecstatic. Like many other University of Massachusetts students, I love partying, and I knew my house had potential for countless crazy nights. When the third weekend approached my roommates and I devised plans for a kickoff party, three kegs, loud music and tons of people.

My greatest fear was the overabundance of police in Amherst and their known tendency to make a presence. As we head toward the final weeks of the school year, it turns out the police should have been my last concern. Instead, I should have focused on stripping my entire house to the bare bones and bolt locking every single room as if it were a safe. Unfortunately, I found this out the hard way.

Digital camera, two iPods, hockey stick, ski pole, bottle of gin, bottle of vodka, package of Fig Newtons, bottle of Jaeger, two bottles of champagne, toaster, wireless router, 30 pills of Adderall, huge poster of the Fantanas, car window, two car antennas, TV remote, "Good Will Hunting" DVD, keg tap and whatever else I'm forgetting.

This is the list of stolen items from my house throughout the year, the price paid for inviting my friends over for a good time. Keep in mind, my roommates and I have continually responded by taking the necessary precautions. But, no matter how hard we try, something always disappears, excluding any physical damage to the house.

Apparently my "prime location" is also prime for hundreds of drunk students – with absolutely no relation to anyone inside – to venture into my house. My weakness, shared by the majority of my roommates, is being laid back, friendly and not very aggressive.

As we head toward the final weeks of the school year, it turns out the police should have been my last concern. Instead, I should have focused on stripping my entire house to the bare bones and bolt locking every single room as if it were a safe. Unfortunately, I found this out the hard way.

I usually tell my friends they can bring whomever they would like and don't bother standing at the door to monitor every head that walks through. This dynamic turned out to be very costly and now I regret being a "nice guy" all the time.

So maybe I should just blame myself. I chose to have the parties. I had the laid-back attitude. Well, whether this is case or not I still have reason to be upset and a message to send out. Students from UMass like to drink; this is common knowledge. However, something I think a lot of people seem to forget is that drinking impairs your judgment.

This is the reason you make that drunken phone call or have sex with that girl you didn't like or decide to punch the police officer in the head. Having hundreds of drunk students in your house reminds you of this. For some reason, and I'm sure a lot of you know exactly what I'm talking about, drunk people all of sudden identify stealing as a fun thing to do. Taking a souvenir from some stranger's house, even a friend's house, is A-ok. And if there's nothing to steal, well then, breaking something should do the trick.

You may have no idea what I'm talking about and think I just have a ton of sketchy friends or something. Well unfortunately that isn't the case.

Many of you can identify with that frame of mind and are reinforcing the fact that it was "just because I was so wasted." Perhaps alcohol is the culprit, but unlike the University, I understand that students won't stop drinking or start drinking less.

Therefore, I can only attempt to ingrain in your head that stupid, careless drunk decisions, attitudes and actions come at others' expenses. Like myself.

Yet there's something about getting a letter – instead of an e-mail or Facebook message – that's exciting. Mail, real mail, is memorable.

I don't want to write some touchy-feely BS column. I've had wonderful opportunities at UMass, doing internships, working in ResLife, going to Mexico and Ireland and going to tons of shows for free thanks to writing for The Daily Collegian's arts section. But I don't want to write about that.

Yes, it's been a great four years – yes we've made some great friendships. Facebook aside, though, how many of your friends are you actually going to keep in touch with after you graduate?

I'm only 22 and I've already gotten to the point where I see someone on my Facebook page and I think, "How do I know this person?" (And for the record, I only friend people I actually know, so I must have spoken to this mystery "Megan" at least once.)

That's not to say Facebook isn't a great way to keep in touch – it's especially useful when you're trying to make dinner plans between seven people who all have hectic schedules.

But yesterday I got a letter from my Aunty Janine in my mailbox. "Your mailbox is going to be so happy – and hopefully you will too: REAL MAIL!" it read.

More than the part wishing me luck with my job hunt and these last few weeks of my college career, I knew this was important.

What happened to real mail? Maybe it's the English major in me, the same person who shuns the Kindle because it doesn't have that book feel or smell, the same person who misses the days when there were library cards instead of printed receipts. (C'mon, those date stamps are fun.) Or maybe at 22 I'm already an old woman lamenting the good old days. I do like to knit, after all.

Yet there's something about getting a letter – instead of an e-mail or Facebook message – that's exciting. Mail, real mail, is memorable. You have to make an effort for real mail. Whether you write it out longhand, type it up and print it out – or, like me, tap away on an old typewriter – it has to be shoved in an envelope, sealed, addressed, stamped and dropped into a mailbox.

Maybe graduation will begin the era of letters in my life. True, college will be over and my friends won't be living in the building next door or across the Bowl. I won't talk to them every day.

But you can't write a good letter to someone if you talk to him everyday. There's nothing new to tell.

I like to think that next year (I almost wrote semester. I won't live by semester after May 23), when I'm jobless, depressed, living at my parent's house and watching reruns of The Cosby Show, I'll also be writing letters to the few good friends of mine who I know would take the time to write me back.

"Yes, I'm still living at home," I'll say. And, "Well, if I die of swine flu at least I won't have to worry about getting a job."

With all the amazing things to do at UMass there's no time left for letter writing. There have been too many readings, homework assignments and meetings. Being an unemployed bum will give me that time.

So while I'll miss the ol' alma mater, I'll be glad to get mail from someone besides the Housing Assignments Office.

Kevin Koczwara

I learned from Howard Ziff "to keep it moving," and to "use strong verbs." His advice will stick with me like a soccer ball sticks to Ronaldhino's feet as he dribbles.

My mother always tells me it takes about three years for me to get comfortable somewhere. She was right about UMass – it took me three years to find my home down in the basement of the Campus Center. The Collegian became a place I could call home.

I started writing movie reviews, about independent films at Amherst Cinema. My passion for writing and film got me through the tough nights of writing, even though no one read any of my reviews. It can be tough being a writer here at UMass, people only see the negative things in your articles.

No one discusses on the comment boards. People argue or attack one another. And from a general consciousness of comments, people don't seem to understand a review is biased – it is the opinion of the knowledgeable reviewer. But still, I did it to the best of my ability and as often as my schedule allowed.

I moved on to become an editor in the Arts and Living Section and to writing different stories. I became a reporter over the past few years, not just an opinionated know-it-all. I wrote a story about Amherst Cinema for last year's Minute, an experience in feature writing flavoring my tongue for more in-depth reporting.

I wrote a preview of Homecoming on deadline while working the arts desk, with a day of reporting at my disposal. It wasn't my best writing, but I got the story done and learned a few valuable lessons: you can't please everyone and how to write with editor's breathing down your neck and when the pressure is on.

I learned over the past few years from the professors in the journalism department that no story is perfect. It is good advice for future journalists. I learned from Howard Ziff "to keep it moving," and to "use strong verbs." His advice will stick with me like a soccer ball sticks to Ronaldhino's feet as he dribbles.

Finding a concentration in the journalism field finally came this year. I came into school wanting to write about sports. I studied Jackie MacMullan's profiles, Bob Ryan's commentary, Peter Gammon's rare columns on ESPN.com, and read Bob Halberstam's marvelous books.

But I started writing about movies, pigeon holing myself in the arts section, but branched out in my writing style. Then I met Norm Sims and Maddy Blais, and they changed how I wanted to write and what I wanted to write about.

Now, I am interested in longer narrative writing that explores the bounds of fiction styles while incorporating journalistic reporting and integrity. The non-fiction narrative has become my passion. I have begun working on ideas for future stories, and seeing stories everywhere I go. I want to explore the everyday and the mundane, because everyone has a story to tell.

My story mirrors many who come to UMass. I came to college shy, lost in the haze of the large University. I came from a high school class of 70 or so students and was confronted with 400 students in a classroom.

It was a shock. Now, I feel I can walk into any room and speak my mind and ask questions. I call anyone and everyone when doing a story – I learned what my parents have always told me "it doesn't hurt to ask," because the worst outcome is you end up where you started. But more often than not you end up with something you never expected. I never expected to have the friends I do now, writing credits in the daily newspaper, being an editor at that paper. But I am happy I finally branched out. I wouldn't have it any other way.

> Whatever happens, I'll look back on these years and think about all the good and the bad times I've had. It might happen a day after I graduate or 10 years down the road, but whenever it happens, I'll smile.

"Life's funny."

I love that statement.

You never know where you are going to end up, who you are going to meet or exactly who you'll become. But, for me anyway, I really still haven't found the last part.

Trust me, I'm still trying to solve that puzzle.

I started my college experience five years ago now – yes, I'm a super senior – at the University of New Haven. I went there because that was the only college that accepted me added with my stubborn refusal to enroll in a community college that was 10 minutes from my house.

In my two years there, I switched majors three times (my parents could have killed me) and made friends with whom I still gab-it-up and visit frequently. My majors ranged from sports management to fire science to music industry. By the time I left there in 2006, I still had no idea what I wanted to do or who I was. But after time passed, I constantly found out who I didn't want to be.

I transferred here, to the University of Massachusetts, in fall 2006 with no idea what I was doing or where I was going in life – I just knew I wanted to pay $20,000 less for school. Coming here with an undecided major also bothered me for whatever reason. So, after some thought (not much) I decided that I might as well pick a subject I enjoy the hell out of: history.

Everyday (no lie) I get asked, "What can you do with a history degree? Become a teacher?" Yes, obviously you can, but other than that I have no idea.

So, I went to expand my horizons again and traveled down to the Campus Center basement, to The Daily Collegian. I came across a group of unfriendly, grouchy and seemingly grimy guys that looked as if they had just fought a war and were waiting upon food rations. I asked them if I could write for the sports section of The Collegian and they told me rather unenthusiastically to put my name, number and e-mail down so they could contact me.

That was February 2008.

A year later, I'm an assistant sports editor.

Funny. Who would have thought?

I understand now why those guys, some of which have graduated or will graduate with me, were so unfriendly. They spend their entire day writing, researching, reading and breathing journalism. To them, this is their life – and I can appreciate that.

For a person who can never settle on anything or is always looking for more out of something I truly envy you guys.

I don't have something I'm passionate about or a career in mind, which I wouldn't necessarily view as "work." That's why I can appreciate that. These guys found something they loved, they know what they want to do and their minds are settled.

If you're a sports fan – correction, if you love sports, this is your dream job: sitting in the press box, watching your favorite sports, interviewing the players and coaches and chumming next to fellow sports writers.

I found that out because I've had help and encouragement along the way. I'm not as good as I should be – I know that – but I've only been doing this for 15 months. I didn't work as hard as I absolutely could have, right, Joe? But that's ok, too – I have time to make it up to you.

Some of the folks at The Collegian are some of my best friends. Some, I might not see again for a while or ever. Sad, I know. But with technology these days, it won't be that hard to communicate.

Others I will see all the time. I'll go to Quincy to visit Joe and reminisce about the good times I've had there; I'll probably even continue flirting with the idea of moving there during the summer.

I flirted with the idea of moving to Ireland. I went so far as getting a work permit to move there. I want to do it, I still do, but I'm young and I'll stick around with my friends and my family. I can do that later in my life. Instead, I'll go visit my favorite place in the world with a good friend who enjoys and appreciates everything it has to offer as much as me.

As for after that, I really have no idea what I'm going to do. But, for now that's ok. I'll figure out something. I'll throw some ideas around and possibly find that last piece I'm looking for.

Spend too much time/money in Barnes & Noble, travel to Canton, Mass., to watch Irish sports and spend time with family and friends who live around here are just some of my options.

My friend and mutual, avid, random, sports fan, Paul, wrote a column yesterday about how people should try things. I couldn't agree more.

I can never make up my mind, so for me that was never a problem. But if you go through these next four years (or more) sticking to what you know, not going out and trying things, meeting new people, taking classes you wouldn't normally, you'll look back and regret all of that.

I'm a person with eclectic interests, which has made my dad to dub me as eccentric. Maybe one of those interests will lead me to a career or maybe there's one right under my nose and I just can't see it yet. Whatever happens, I'll look back on these years and think about all the good and the bad times I've had. It might happen a day after I graduate or 10 years down the road, but whenever it happens, I'll smile.

I got a letter in the mail about six months ago. It was addressed from my old school in New Haven. I wrote the letter at the orientation five years ago. My group's leader instructed us to write down what we wanted our college years to be.

"I want these to be the best years of my life," was one of the five or so hopeful statements I wrote.

Well, they were, I can honestly say that.

> Though his name eludes me at the moment, a famous journalist once said, "I sincerely feel sorry for anyone who has never worked for a newspaper." Well put, Mr. Man-whose-name-I-can't-seem-to-remember.

I just sat down, anxious to write my senior column and yet, I was just not 100 percent on what to say. I mean, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian has been (with the exception of my wonderful girlfriend, Jen) the biggest part of my college life.

I've spent a lot of time down there in that little newsroom in the bowels of the Campus Center. It's kept me hostage waiting for women's sports game to finish up at 11 p.m., it's dragged me down for staff meetings and it's held an unrelenting grip on me way past my 9 p.m. punch-out time as a copy editor.

But don't get me wrong – I've loved every minute of it. (Well, almost every minute, anyway).

Though his name eludes me at the moment, a famous journalist once said, "I sincerely feel sorry for anyone who has never worked for a newspaper." Well put, Mr. Man-whose-name-I-can't-seem-to-remember.

Working for a daily newspaper – especially New England's oldest and largest college daily – is definitely a great experience.

It comes with a tremendous feeling of responsibility and joy knowing that your hard work is what keeps the members of your community in tune with what is going on, whether it's profiling certain members for their achievements, keeping them abreast (hehe, a breast) of what their government is doing or simply giving them the news of the day.

The Collegian – though not perfect – does that for the UMass community. It has also given me the opportunity to hone my skills at the craft I love – and for that I am eternally grateful. I don't mean this as a cliché, but it really does seem like just yesterday when I walked into The Collegian office looking to start working there. I know I've told this story before, but I'm going to tell it again, so shut up and keep reading.

In 2005, a family friend gave my parents and me a spring tour of campus. He also told us about this daily newspaper called "The Collegian," and said it was one of the best college papers in the country. When I returned to campus for an official tour I made it a point to find a copy of The Collegian.

When I did, I couldn't believe my eyes. The front-page headline said that the swans and ducks in the campus pond had been electrocuted by a cell phone, President Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin had gotten into a slapping and mud wrestling match and the sports section said Doug Flutie was "a pint-sized quarterback and all-around dickhead."

As it would turn out, that was The Collegian's April's Fool Day edition (or "The Morning Wood"). When my freshman year started I began writing for cross-country when then-sports editor Jeff Howe gave me my first beat in early October. I have been a Collegianite since then.

I've learned a lot of this business and made some good friends – all of whom have helped me along the way. And because it is impossible for me to thank you all, I will thank you collectively: Thank you everyone at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Thank you for everything you have given me and taught me. I will never forget any of it and I will miss you all.

Talkin' Girl Talk

By Leigh Greaney
Collegian Staff

Gregg Gillis lunges at his laptop while his stage name – Girl Talk – swirls into a vortex on the screen behind him. The words "we ready" repeat in a poppy cheer booming through his speakers. Purple hoodie-clad Gillis leaped into the crowd. A playful smirk swept his face as he got back on stage only to jump into the crowd a second time – assuring the crowd he's going to fill them with as much energy as they can handle.

Not even ten minutes into the hard-not-to-dance-to set, Gillis took off his hoodie and ripped his undershirt to pieces. At that point the crowd was as covered in confetti as he was in his own sweat. The stage suddenly filled with randomly chosen fans who were willing to shake it. Two masked and colorful figures also emerged from backstage, armed with toilet paper guns to shoot out at the audience.

Hands became an ocean out of rhythm. To fight what could have easily caused sea sickness from staring into the crowd, Gillis danced harder than anyone else there. He ceased to stop moving – all the while fingering his laptop keys.

Sandwiched between All Time Low's pop-rock set and Lupe Fiasco's hip-hop performance, Gillis was doing something similar, yet very different. He played live music remixed from preexisting music. Using a program called "AudioMultch," Gillis was gardening music in real time.

In an interview, he explained what everyone seemed to be asking: What is he doing up there?

"The way I actually perform is all live sample triggering. In the course of an hour performance, I might go through three or four hundred different loops," Gillis said.

"I try to have all of the elements as isolated as possible," he continued. "So when you hear drums playing, it might just sound like a drum loop, but it could be one kick drum sample then a hand clap sample then a high-hat sample. It could all be isolated. It's like every two seconds I'm actually triggering samples by hand stringing it, kicking things in and out."

"The show is a bit more free formed. It's a bit more experimental. It's not as specific. The records are something that I really sit down and spend a lot of time on every second and piece everything together perfectly, whereas the show has a bit of a more experimental, improvisational edge to it."

Most of the samples that he looped through the set were the same samples that he's been working with on his four albums.

"In using samples that I use on the albums, I like to spell it out there for people how live it is. When you hear stuff from the record, I like it to be a slightly new take. Maybe the drums will come in at a different time, or the vocals will come in differently or I'll repeat something a certain number of times or blend a familiar vocal line from an album with a different melody. So, every show I'm working on new stuff. I could probably go out there and do an entire show of new material, but I think a lot of people are familiar with the past two albums so I like to do reinterpretations of a lot of material," Gillis said.

He explained that laptop music directly correlates to live music. When fans come to a show, they want to hear their favorite song. Gillis is able to accommodate fans by playing their favorite song from his albums – in a new, transformative way.

Not only is his music easily converted from album to stage, but also from small to large venues. In UMass' Mullins

McConaughey fails as romantic hero

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

Matthew McConaughey doesn't really register as a romantic hero in movies, but try telling that to the deities who cast romantic comedies.

The actor puts his natural swagger to good use in the new film, "Ghosts of Girlfriends Past." While the casting directors get it half-right, giving McConaughey a role that plays to his strengths, their attempts to transform him by story's end into another assembly line Prince Charming seem downright laughable.

In fact, it's one of the only running gags in the movie that works.

McConaughey stars as womanizing photographer Connor Meade, who, like the cameraman in the 1966 film "Blowup," seems to use his work as a front for his voyeurism — he likes to watch women from behind the lens. Under the guidance of his late uncle (Michael Douglas), Meade learned the basic tricks of the trade early — if you like a girl go after another one; if you want a girl to know who's boss, try insulting her a little bit; and at all costs, never, ever spoon.

These tricks have since become Meade's creed. Shortly after the credits end, Meade breaks up with three ladies simultaneously via video chat, before leaping into the arms of yet another gal (Christina Milian).

But of course, Meade can't go on having guilt-free, casual sex forever. After leaving New York to attend the wedding of his younger brother (Breckin Meyer), "Ghosts of Girlfriends Past" pits Meade against the not-so-happy ghosts of his past, present and dating future, all of whom are eager to show Meade the error of his lecherous ways.

"Ghosts" plays around with the basic theme of "A Christmas Carol," bringing Meade face-to-face with the ghost of the frizzy haired ginger (Emma Stone) who would become his first conquest. Their teenaged hook-up (with him in junior Don Johnson of "Miami Vice" garb and her exuding the Madonna-esque fashion sense of the 1980s) is one of the funnier scenes offered up by the film.

But are these ladies even dead? Well, not exactly. This is an especially confusing point after Meade's assistant Melanie (Noureen DeWulf) turns up as the ghost of dating present. She's not a girlfriend (or a corpse), but she's doled out plenty of Kleenex in her time to the ladies he's wronged. As a result, she's kind of an authority.

Although "Ghosts," directed by Mark Waters ("Mean Girls"), seems like a cute idea, something soon goes awry. Maybe it's the smarm in McConaughey's pick-up lines or the awkward chemistry between him and Jennifer Garner, who plays his love interest, Jenny.

Like many other women, Jenny's been a notch on the bedpost of Connor Meade, but her notch is one that cuts deeper than most. Being bedded and abandoned by Meade – who was also her first love – has left her with a chip on her shoulder.

Kate Hudson would be better suited for the role of shrew-like Jenny, and would have handled it with more aplomb than Garner is able to muster here. It's not her fault, really – Garner's just more believable as a sweet-natured girl next door. When the film turns her into the embittered mascot for all of Meade's former conquests, she seems out of her element.

Meanwhile, McConaughey stays right in his, until he's dragged kicking and screaming to an idyllic happy ending that seems entirely insincere.

But when he's not being reined in or forced to repent for his ways, McConaughey seems to enjoy being in Meade's skin. He savors the script's cheese ball lines, and even though the dialogue remains clunky coming out of his mouth, McConaughey's delight is infectious.

Small-time releases, big time expectations

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

The first half of 2009 has seen a hodgepodge of interesting and important releases. Some established underground artists have broken further into mainstream music, and other newcomers have interjected themselves into online publications' collective consciousness by offering small-time releases broadened by the scope of Internet downloads.

Hip hop has seen a quiet year thus far, but its prominent releases have been exceptionally strong. Possibly the strongest rap release yet has come from last year's top-selling artist Lil' Wayne in the form of his "Hottest N*gga Under the Sun" mix tape.

The mix continues Wayne's auto-tune trend (which he completely rid himself of on his latest "The Empire 7" mix), finding room for endless small-time guest spots from his Young Money crew as well as a track with Chingy, "Let's Get It." While the mix tape sees some pretty awful material (like "Prom Queen" from his new cringe-worthy "rock" record "Rebirth"), more than half of the 26 tracks are bangers, ready to blast out of open car windows all summer. From the opening verse in "My Name Is" (taken from the Santigold song "Unstoppable"), Wayne spits line after line dissing you and amping himself up, cycling through all his personalities – the player, the sweetheart, the hunk, the killer, the business man.

Wayne continues to wedge himself into fans' ears and establish himself as today's greatest (case in point – "Hi, my name is best rapper alive, and your mouth is the best crapper alive"). Key tracks include "Filet Mignon," "Yes" (featuring Pharrell), "Hello World," "Blow My Mind" and "Yeahhh."

Radio-ready rap hasn't been the only noteworthy hip hop to hit shelves this year. DOOM's new record "Born Like This," released March 24 on Lex Records, has been anticipated for a while as the next work from perennial lord of underground hip hop Daniel Dumile.

He dropped the "MF" ("Metal Face") from his name, kept the mask from which his namesake is derived, and proceeded to create an all-over-the-place yet comfortable hip hop record. DOOM (so enlists many guests (Ghostface as Tony Starks, Raekwon, members of De La Soul, borrows J Dilla beats) and poetically wrestles with his tongue to get every necessary syllable out from his head and through his mouth. While this was a solid release in full, it merely allows listeners to anticipate what's to come – a full new Raekwon record, a full-length DOOM/Ghostface collaboration and a new posthumous J Dilla record, which will in fact be produced by Dilla's mother.

Other genres have been successful as well, as Animal Collective's journey from obscurity and near-unlistenability to pop culture awareness and accessibility has been completed. Their album "Merriweather Post Pavilion," released January 6 on Domino Records, incorporates the group's tribal tendencies with beefed up production, which brings strong rhythms and chanting harmony to the forefront in place of their former muddled, washed-out sound.

This was one of the most highly anticipated releases of the early part of the year and succeeded almost across the board, attracting new fans, astonishing die hard junkies and pleasing critics alike. The second track on the album, "My Girls," is one of their most perfect attempts at pop supremacy to date. It provides a driving, danceable rhythm which builds over the entirety of the song as well as some human, almost sugar-sweet sentiments about daughters and wives.

COURTESY DOMINO RECORDS

Dirty Projectors are one of a handful of small-level bands primed for success this summer. Their forthcoming album, "Bitte Orca," is slated for a June 9 release.

Another act rising to pop prominence is Grizzly Bear with their new album "Veckatimest," out May 26 on Warp Records. The band landed a spot on critics' best-of lists in 2006 with its beautiful "Yellow House" LP and with its new record, which continues to work within pop boundaries, squeezing out tight structures, gorgeous guitar tones and percussion to bind all the loose ends. Also in the upper-production spectrum lies the new Dirty Projectors album "Bitte Orca."

The follow-up to 2007's Black Flag-referencing "Rise Above," the new album sees even more harmonies from the band's female vocalists, seeing comparisons to Mariah Carey, though nowhere near as accomplished. The album officially drops June 9 on Domino Records, but a 12" single for stand-out track "Stillness Is the Move" is already available. The track's noodly guitars ring out and compliment the steady rhythm, something the Dirty Projectors don't seem too fond of finding often as their songs are often very loose and ethereal.

Many smaller acts are beginning to pop up all over the country as well.

One label, Underwater Peoples, has corralled many such acts together to make up a forthcoming compilation ready for summer listening. Featured on the compilation, among others, are Real Estate, Julian Lynch and Ducktails. Real Estate – New Jersey residents via Hampshire College – craft pleasant summertime jams, recalling loose acts such as Galaxie 500 and jammier acts such as the Grateful Dead. They've got a couple 7"s under their belt and will release a proper debut this year. Their songs tell tales of Suburbia: pools, dogs, hot pavement, comfort. One of their members, Matthew Mondanile, works his solo project Ducktails in the downtime, crafting arty, repetition-based psych work-outs with tape-loops and other noise-making devices. His self-titled 7" was released last year on Breaking World Records (based locally in Northampton) to endless critical acclaim. The record's anchor, "Beach Point Pleasant," provides the sound of utter guitar bliss wrapped around what sounds like a tiny snippet of a children's tape sped up ten times. The results are fantastic, sounds melting in and out of each other until the track dissolves into oblivion. His self-titled LP awaits release this year along with a split with Julian Lynch.

Julian Lynch is a friend of Mondanile's from Wisconsin, whose musical intentions don't stray too far from those of Ducktails. Lynch crafts revolving melody, quietly singing in his high-pitched croon while layers of guitars fill up any and all desired space. The songs found on his release "Orange You Glad" seem recorded in a bedroom rather than a garage: fuzzy and easy to warm up to. His music, much like that of Real Estate and Ducktails, waits patiently for the slow motion ease of summer where an entire day can be spent sitting on the porch watching the sun burnt grass slowly turn to brown. Lynch will release that previously mentioned split with Ducktails on Underwater Peoples, as well as a proper LP release of "Orange You Glad."

One more interesting act to emerge at the beginning of this year is Teengirl Fantasy, a duo composed of Logan Takahashi and Nick Weiss who both attend Oberlin College in Ohio. The two craft pulsating, circular dance rhythms which build blips and washes of sound into heavy, tangible compositions. Thus far they've only got their "Portofino" 7" out on Mexik Records, but surely there's more to come.

A digital EP simply named "TGF" was recently released on the internet, featuring one new track "Floor to Floor" in addition to three previously available tracks. The duo played shows this past winter with Telepathe and absolutely blew them out of the water, at least at their Vassar College show, and will tour with them again at the beginning of the summer including a June 2 date in Cambridge at the Middle East. They've crafted some of the best summer jams of the first half of the year and are sure to crank out more as the year progresses.

Center, the stadium seating is questionable when it comes to enjoying the show. For Gillis, it's a means of perspective. As long as the stage can be seen, the experience can be just as rich for every person.

"I'm down for anything. I like playing tiny shows and big shows," Gillis said.

"At UMass, I just sound checked and didn't really know how many people were going to be there until I got onstage. I've played a lot of college shows, but I think this was potentially the biggest."

For an artist that is used to playing smaller venues, this could possibly violate the intimacy that a smaller crowd harnesses. But could bigger mean better?

"I've played so many shows with smaller audiences over the years," Gillis said.

"I feel like that's kind of the heart of the project to play these small, tiny shows – intimate affairs, but I've just learned over the past few years playing larger shows can be really amazing. The bigger shows don't need that level of intimacy to … be something else, especially with kind of celebratory music, dance music, club music that people sing along to, with thousands of people there; it's going to be a magical experience."

Better isn't always the case, but different definitely is.

"I don't think one's better than the other. It can go really well either way. The show at UMass – it can be something much more massive and amazing if it goes down correctly. For me it's almost comical playing at a stadium. It's nice people can watch the show from different angles. Sometimes at a festival depending on the layout and the larger shows, the people in the far, far back don't really have any angle to actually see anything. So for the people in the stadium seating it's kind of nice that they can get a glimpse of something," Gillis said.

The best part of the shows for the crowd and for Gillis is the "free for all" atmosphere. At smaller shows, he asks that the barricades be taken down so people can jump on stage. Though such magical mayhem cannot be accommodated at UMass, Gillis tries to get as many people as he can on stage. The back line was geared up with Lupe's equipment, leaving less room for booty-dropping bodies, but still providing the rave vibe that Gillis loves.

Also adding to the vibe, Gillis' best friend and real time VJ, Andrew Strasser, was part of the set. The screen behind Gillis and his dancing accompaniment burst with colorful images of remixed pop-culture images. Strasser has done all of Gillis' album artwork over the years, as well as his promotional photos.

"It's fun to create your own narrative based on this music that's based on other people's material," said Gillis of the VJ element of his live shows. "A lot of the images Andrew works with play upon familiar themes without actually using images of the people I sample. So, something like a marijuana leaf or a basketball or a skull or whatever, to me, they're all very pop culture, iconic imagery."

There seemed to be a lot of symbolism: from a montage of bricks, Benjamins and fireworks, to a collage of bricks, laptops and mics. There were stacks of cheeseburgers with french fries exploding in the background (symbolic, of course, of the deliciously nutritious road-food that Gillis sweat out on stage) – and even a skull with jack-o-lanterns coming out of its nose and eye cavities while biting down on a 100 dollar bill with Ben Franklin's face whited out while fireworks light up the sky behind it.

"It fun – with the artwork as well – to create a narrative where it doesn't exist. You can create any story line you want. I think it's fun to play with darker imagery when playing such upbeat, positive pop music. With the flames and even the album artwork for the last album (Feed the Animals) and that's why I have the toilet paper gunners wear masks."

Gillis is from the laptop music world – one he considers himself born out of. "The people I grew up looking up to in this music world were other laptop artists or other garage artists. People like John Oswald, Kid606, Negativland. It's comical to me that a lot of people just didn't know that world of influence and automatically associated me with a DJ … They don't know what to do with me I guess," Gillis said.

Mainstream culture doesn't quite know what to do with laptop music in general, but it's definitely breaking out. "Twenty years ago people couldn't imagine what has become popular and mainstream now. Using a computer and using previously existing material has existed a long time, but is becoming very common now. So, I'm excited to see where it goes," Gillis said.

"For me, it's very exciting to be part of these big shows and all the shows and festivals and things like that. Just the fact that for your Spring Concert 2009 one of the artists was a guy playing a laptop. Therefore, that goes on to influence other people there to make their own beats, do their own mashups, whatever," he added.

What drew Gillis into computer music and electronic music was exactly that – people can just pick it up.

"One of the reasons I got involved with it in the first place, was just because you don't need traditional musical training. You can express ideas and be creative and do things outside of the box just because its software and you can learn it on your own and make up your own rules. I think when you look at innovative artists over the years, it's not really about a traditional talent level always. If more and more people make things, the more it will become innovative."

So, 20 years from now maybe we'll have a pop-culture icon with a computer for an instrument. Gillis predicts that "there's gonna be some kid messing around with a computer, who is 10 years old, who in six years could potentially be winning a music award on MTV for the album they made." Luckily, while we're waiting for him to emerge into the scene, we still have Girl Talk to "bounce that."

The good and the bad

Nicholas O'Malley

Love them, hate them, the Minutemen are ours.

After replacing the Redmen in 1979 and fending off the Gray Wolf in 2003, it seems as though the University of Massachusetts Minutemen and Minutewomen are here to stay. With that in mind and the school year winding down, it seems as good a time as any to take a look at the Top 5 best and most disappointing aspects of UMass athletics.

THE GOOD

1. CLASS-ACT COACHES

If there's one thing about UMass athletics that The Daily Collegian knows, it's the coaches. We work with them everyday.

And with this in mind, we can say that this school is ripe with quality coaches that are great with their athletes, fans and, of course, the media.

There are too many amicable coaches to name here without leaving some of the deserving coaches out.

2. ATHLETES WITH A CHIP ON THEIR SHOULDER

Despite being 90 miles away, UMass struggles to escape the shadow of Boston College when it comes to athletics. That combined with many strong athletic programs in the region, really hampers the ability of UMass coaches to recruit.

Due to this, many athletes that do come to play at UMass are those that were overlooked by some of those larger schools. For example, former goalkeeper Zack Simmons was a walk-on, quarterback Liam Coen was overlooked by BC and the lacrosse team's Doc Schneider was one of many Minutemen to be overlooked by larger programs.

That rejection is not lost on UMass athletes, who lick their chops at the chance to take on the "top" schools that turned them down.

3. SAM'S THE MAN

There are currently 39 collegiate sports programs that are nicknamed the Bulldogs, 45 named the Tigers and 60 named the Eagles. Yet, there is only one Sam the Minuteman (except for the Heritage College Minutemen in Toppenish, Wash.)

While not as unique as the California State University-Long Beach Dirtbags or the University of California-Santa Cruz Banana Slugs, the Minuteman is almost always associated with the Maroon and White.

4. APPROACHABLE ATHLETES

While UMass is in the upper echelon in terms of status in the college sports world, its sports teams don't carry themselves with the same bravado as athletes from other schools.

5. THE FANS

Sign guy, little dude, the light song, "f*ck 'em up, f*ck 'em up, go UMass," this school's got a good fan base for as small a sports market Western Mass. is.

THE BAD

1. THE BEST TEAMS GO UNNOTICED

At a recent game for the UMass softball team, one of the top softball programs of the country, the Minutewomen trounced George Washington, 7-0. Only 206 people saw it.

This is a recurring theme in all of college athletics. Less popular sports will draw lighter crowds.

At UMass though, these teams are often the top sports at the school. Whether it's field hockey, softball, swimming and diving or tennis, many teams don't get the attention they deserve.

2. SHORTAGE OF TEAMS

As the recent removal of the ski team's varsity status has shown, the UMass athletic department's budget is not in the best condition. It goes without saying that there are countless things the school could get with a better-funded department, particularly more programs that once bore the maroon and white.

Back in 2002, seven sports programs were cut: women's volleyball, men's and women's water polo, men's and women's gymnastics, men's tennis and men's track and field. Of these, only track has been restored.

3. LOOSE CANNONS

While playing the underdog role suits UMass athletics well, it sometimes gets its players into trouble.

Fans familiar with the tendencies of many sports programs know that the Minutemen and Minutewomen have a reputation for getting more than their fair share of fouls.

For example, compared to 68 penalties called on its opponents, the UMass football team was flagged 90 times last season. UMass field hockey: eight yellow cards; opponents: two. Although by narrow margins, the UMass hockey and men's lacrosse teams where also called for more penalties than their opponents.

4. HIGH ATTENDANCE, LACK OF "FANS"

For basketball and hockey games at the Mullins Center, the highest attendance numbers were easily posted on nights where free t-shirts were given out. This spike in fan base is exemplified by a number of students that enter the Mullins Center on those nights, grab a t-shirt or two and leave.

5. FCS FRUSTRATION

After many rumored attempts of the UMass football program attempting to achieve then-Division 1-A, now-Football Bowl Subdivision (FBS) status, it's difficult to describe the position of the team.

It's great for fans that the Minutemen are one of the top schools in the Football Championship Subdivision (FCS), they still can't play as them in NCAA '09.

Honorable mention: the lights at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. These things cost about $1.8 million to put in and they use them once a season. Really?

NEC's up next for UMass

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's track and field team looks to rebound from a disappointing showing at last week's Atlantic 10 Championships with another strong home performance at this weekend's New England Championships.

The Minutemen are coming off a 10th place finish at the A-10 Championships, the worst finish at the competition in school history. However, the top performance of the event for UMass came from sophomore Daniel Schwartz, who finished third in the decathlon.

"Everyone suffers a letdown or a sub-par performance at some point," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "Good competitors respond to a letdown in the next one, and that's what I expect from us."

Twenty-three individual athletes and three relay teams have qualified for the second meet of the championship season. UMass is in strong position to continue its dominance of the distance events, with six qualifiers in the 5,000 meter run and the 10,000 meters, respectively.

Junior Andrew Mulvaney and sophomores David and Kevin Johnson qualified for both events for the Minutemen.

Junior Nicolai Naranjo will look to repeat his strong performance at last year's meet, where he finished first in the 5,000 meter with a time of 14 minutes, 22.57 seconds. Junior Jonathan Pierce also scored in the 5,000 meter for UMass last season with a sixth place finish.

The Minutemen also look for strong performances in the 800 meter run and the decathlon. Junior Ryan DiOno has had a consistent season, notching two second-place finishes while never finishing outside the Top 10 in the 800 meters. Sophomore Scott VanderMolen has been very productive at home this season, finishing third at the UMass Pre-Conference Meet and sixth at the UMass Six-Way Meet.

Schwartz, sophomore Chris Dzidek and freshman Daniel Wu will compete in the decathlon for the Minutemen. Schwartz was one of the few bright spots for the UMass last week, taking third place with 5,883 points, while Dzidek took seventh place with 5,426 points. At the Holy Cross Decathlon, Schwartz ranked sixth, with Dzidek rounding out the Top 10.

On the women's side, 17 individual athletes will also compete at the New England Championships this week. Junior Lisa Wilson and redshirt senior Kristen Bakanowski look to lead the Minutewomen once again. Wilson will compete in the shot put, discus toss and the hammer throw. Last week she was named the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week after finishing first in the discus, second in the shot put and sixth in the hammer at the A-10 Championships.

Bakanowski looks for her sixth top-two finish in the pole vault after winning the event in the first two meets of the season and has racked up three consecutive second-place finishes since.

Sophomores Ida Okkonen and Stephanie Aguggio could also have an impact on the field event rankings, with both competing in the triple jump, and Okkonen competing in the long jump. Freshman Karen Roa also looks to make an impact this weekend, qualifying for the 3,000 meter steeplechase and the 5,000 meter run.

The meet will be held at the UMass Track & Field Complex and begins Friday at 10 a.m.

UM to open seven-game homestand

Pivotal games for A-10 chance

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Sometimes a team needs the comfort and familiarity of home in order to get back to winning ways.

The Massachusetts baseball team will try to do just that when it returns to Earl Lorden Field this weekend to face Rhode Island to start a seven-game home stand.

This will be a pivotal series for the Minutemen as conference wins become increasingly crucial as the season winds down. UMass (19-23, 11-10 Atlantic 10) is currently sixth in the A-10 standings and only one game ahead of Fordham.

Only the top six teams in the conference are invited to the A-10 Tournament and this weekend could make or break the Minutemen's chances at post-season play.

As UMass gears up to play the Rams (32-15, 17-3 A-10), UMass coach Mike Stone is focused on what his team needs to do to make it to the conference tournament.

"Right now we're right in the thick of things, and we need to have a good weekend," Stone said.

"Obviously one of our goals at the beginning of the year was getting into the tournament and we have an opportunity to do that as long as we continue to play well. We're excited about the opportunity [to face URI] and we're looking forward to it."

The Minutemen have won four of their last six games, scoring 42 total runs in that span.

Offensively, UMass is led by outfielder Mike Donato, who paces the team with 58 hits and a .339 average. Against Northeastern on Wednesday, Donato went 1-for-4 with a run scored, as the Minutemen went on to fall to the Huskies, 6-4, in a rematch of this season's Beanpot Championship. A consistent hitter for Stone, Donato has put together strings of four and five-game hitting streaks on multiple occasions this season.

Another player that is doing well this season is junior outfielder Mike Gedman. Gedman is riding a three-game hit streak, all of which he's compiled multiple hits in. While he's not an everyday position player, he wields a .329 average and is productive on the mound as well.

Gedman has a team-leading 2.25 earned-run average, including five saves, good for a tie with Saint Louis' Chaz Salembier for fourth in the conference. He's struck out 18 batters in 20 innings-pitched so far this season.

Gedman's younger brother, shortstop Matt Gedman, started the season off slow offensively, batting just .219 after 25 games. However, Gedman now boasts a .270 average and has hit safely in his last 11 games, registering nine RBIs during that span, including a 2-for-3 showing in UMass' last game against Northeastern.

"That's big," Stone said of Gedman's offense finally being on par with his defense. "I think that Matt's a good hitter when he gets balanced and stays squared-up. It's nice to have people at the bottom part of the order providing offense for us and he swung the bat well [against the Huskies on Wednesday] and hopefully he'll continue to do that throughout the weekend."

The last time the Minutemen clashed with URI, the Rams took two of three games in Kingston, R.I., while being outscored, 10-9.

URI is a team that is effective on the basepaths, accumulating a conference-best 87 stolen bases this season. The Rams have three players who have stolen 10 or more bases this season: Jeff Cammans (16), Tom Coulombe (15) and Mike Lebel (12).

One of the offensive leaders for Rhode Island is shortstop Dan Rhault, who is batting .380, with 62 hits, nine home runs and 49 RBIs.

Rhault's stellar play has put him on the Brooks Wallace Award watch list, the award given to the nation's top shortstop.

Minutewomen swing for fences

Home runs lead to A-10 tourney win

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

BRONX, N.Y. — After coaching her final practice before the Atlantic 10 Tournament, Elaine Sortino needed one thing from her team.

"Everyone has to be good and if everyone is good, we're great," UMass coach Sortino said before getting on the bus headed to Fordham University, host of the 2009 A-10 Tournament.

When the No. 20 Minutewomen (36-8, 17-2 A-10) took the field Thursday opposite Fordham, they did exactly that. No one player was a star, but the team was great — whether at the plate, on the mound or in the field — as they defeated the Rams, 5-1, in their opening game of the A-10 Tournament.

Starting pitcher Brandice Balschmiter set the pace for the game as she allowed just one hit — a weak ground ball that bounced off her thigh and just enough out of reach to allow Fordham's Beckah Wiggins to reach on an infield single — through the first five innings. The Rams (36-21, 13-8 A-10) scored one run in the top of the sixth, the only inning Balschmiter had any trouble.

"It was just a series of unfortunate happenings," Sortino said after the game.

The senior began the sixth by inducing a ground ball back to herself from Fordham's Megan Waldron. The Rams' catcher, Meghan Shager, then singled a 2-2 pitch down the left-field line for Fordham's first base runner since the second inning.

Shager was forced out at second base in the next at-bat as the leadoff batter, Melissa Andrews, grounded into a fielder's choice. Andrews stole second before Balschmiter walked the next batter, leaving the Minutewomen with runners on first and second and two outs.

Two pitches later, Mary Beth Puccio blooped the ball over shortstop Whitney Williams, plating Andrews for the Rams' lone run of the game. Puccio advanced to second, placing runners at second and third on a fielding error by left fielder Samantha Salato. Balschmiter induced another ground ball to first baseman Sarah Reeves to end the threat.

Balschmiter pitched seven innings giving up just one run on four hits and one walk while striking out five.

The single run was not enough, as UMass had already built up a 4-0 lead. The Minutewomen first got on the board in the second inning when Reeves led off the frame with a solo home run off Fordham's Chelsea Plimpton to left-center field. Salato followed up Reeves with a towering pop-up that carried over the wall again in left-center field, giving UMass back-to-back home runs and a 2-0 lead. The home run was Salato's 16th of the season, breaking the UMass single-season record of 15 set by Stacy Cullington in 2007.

|---|---|
| UMass | 5 |
| Fordham | 1 |

"It's a great honor to have," Salato said. "There are so many great players to come through this program and it's nice to be up there with them."

"It will be nice to see her name in the record book for at least one year," Sortino said.

Behind three home runs, the Minutewomen defeated Fordham Thursday, 5-1, in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Bronx, N.Y.

UMass picked up another run in the third on another leadoff home run by the A-10 Player of the Year, Carly Normandin, her 10th home run of the season.

In the fourth, the Minutewomen traded in the long ball and put together a succession of hits to plate their fourth run of the game. Davina Hernandez led off the inning by reaching first base on an error by Plimpton and reached second when Normandin drew a walk. Whitney Williams tried to move the runners over but instead blooped a bunt to third base. Hernandez was forced out at third, but Williams beat out the throw to first, leaving runners at first and second.

Two batters later, Reeves drove in Normandin from second — Reeves' second run batted in of the game — on a single up the middle.

Plimpton finished the game giving up five runs, three earned on six hits and two walks while striking out four.

The game was held up for over four hours in the sixth inning as rain and lightning swept over Bahoshy Field and the Fordham campus. When play resumed, UMass tacked on an insurance run, its fifth of the game, on a Hernandez double, and Balschmiter came back out to pitch the seventh inning. The ace for the Minutewomen gave up one hit, which amounted to nothing for the Rams, to close out the victory for UMass.

The win advances the Minutewomen in the double elimination tournament to face Saint Louis at 1 p.m. today for an opportunity to play in the championship game. The loss moved Fordham into the loser's bracket to play Saint Joseph's. The Rams beat the Hawks, 5-3, in the opening round of the tournament, advancing to the second round to play UMass.

Tim Balise was one of five UMass players to be honored by the Eastern College Athletic Conference Tuesday. Balise was named to the first team.

Six UMass members honored

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Doc Schneider found out on Tuesday that he was not one of five finalists for the Tewaaraton Trophy, the "Heisman Trophy" of Division I lacrosse. But the standout Massachusetts men's lacrosse goalkeeper didn't go home empty-handed that day.

Schneider was among six UMass members honored by the Eastern College Athletic Conference on Tuesday as the league announced its awards for the 2009 season.

The senior stopper, who ranks second in the nation in save percentage, was named ECAC Goalie of the Year. Jim Connolly (Offensive Player of the Year) and Greg Cannella (Coach of the Year) were also honored, as were attack Tim Balise and defender Diogo Godoi, who were named to the ECAC First Team. Midfielder Bobby Hayes was named to the Second Team.

Schneider, who helped lead UMass to the 2006 national championship game, became the first player in school history to win the award. He paced the ECAC in both save percentage (65.8) and goals-against average (7.30) to become one of the original 21 finalists for the Tewaaraton Trophy. He won the ECAC Defensive Player of the Week Award six times and was named to the ECAC First Team after two straight years on the second team.

Connolly became the third Minuteman to win the ECAC Offensive Player of the Year award (Chris Fiore in 2003, Sean Morris in 2005 and 2006), helping lead UMass to the conference title with an ECAC-leading 35 goals. He came through when his team needed him the most, netting three game-winning goals.

Cannella, in his 15th season as head coach of the Minutemen, takes home his league-record fourth coaching award. He also won the award in 2004, 2002 and 2001. He didn't win the award in 2006, but was named the USILA National Coach of the Year after a runner-up finish in the NCAAs.

Balise scored 30 goals, tying for second place in the conference. The senior led the ECAC with 33 goals last season, which also ended with a first-team selection.

Along with Schneider, Godoi helped UMass boast one of the stingiest defenses in the country this season. The 7.77 goals allowed per game by the Minutemen ranked No. 9 in the nation. He generally had the responsibility in defending the top goal-scorer for each opponent this season and provided a number of big hits on defense.

Hayes led the Minutemen in assists with 14, finished third on the team with 25 points and was one of just six players with double-digit goals (11).

PHENOM seeks grant

UMass students including Student Trustee Emily Bloch, center, sign up to help PHENOM. Students called congressmen to show their support for increased funding for higher education in the Bay State.

By Hannah McGoldrick
Collegian Staff

Last Thursday, PHENOM [Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts] hosted a call-in day with the intention of "sav[ing] higher education in the state budget." More than 150 students, faculty and community members placed calls to their local senators and state representatives across Massachusetts.

Within the next two weeks, the Massachusetts Senate Committee on Ways and Means will be releasing its report of the FY2010 budget. The purpose of the call-in day was to "encourage students to contact their senators and ask for support in increased funding for need-based financial aid," said Bliss Requa-Trautz, a junior at UMass and member of PHENOM.

In particular, PHENOM wished to urge the Massachusetts senators to support access to public higher education by increasing funding for MASSGrant, the state's primary need-based financial aid program.

According to Requa-Trautz, in 1988, MASSGrant covered approximately 80 percent of the cost of attendance at public institutions in Massachusetts. She said it now covers less than 15 percent of the cost.

"Increasing funding for MASSGrant by $14.1 million would provide awards to over 15,000 students with financial need," said Requa-Trautz.

"We're seeing that the state does not have enough money to do what it needs to do. The state should put money towards public higher education," said Sam Dreyfus, a member of Massachusetts Students Uniting.

One of the proposed ways to increase funding is to increase revenue. According to PHENOM, "Massachusetts is in desperate need of revenue because of a long history of reckless tax cuts and the current recession."

PHENOM proposes that by raising taxes, the state will be able to avoid "devastating cuts to social services and education."

Requa-Trautz said "targeting the income tax would be the most progressive way to raise revenue."

PHENOM is proposing that the state restore the income tax to its 1999 level of 5.95 percent. This increase would raise an additional $1.4 billion. The income tax is currently at a flat 5.3 percent for all taxpayers. Raising the income tax one full percentage to 6.3 percent would result in an additional revenue raise of $2.16 billion.

When asked how the income tax raise is progressive, PHENOM said that the tax is "progressive due to exemptions and credits that lessen the impact on low-income individuals" now is the time to restore the state income tax to its 1990s levels." PHENOM also went on to say that this raise could be made even more progressive by raising the personal exemption.

Ryan Bell, a student at UMass, attended the call-in day. "I've never done anything like this before, but I think it is important because public universities provide education for students of the state," he said. "Those with less money do not have the same opportunities if funding is not increased."

Lindsay McCluskey, this year's outgoing SGA Student Trustee, said, "even though this is a busy time with finals, it is important for students to be the ones contacting senators it shows that we are engaged."

Many of the senators who were contacted said that they were in support of increasing funding for MASSGrant. However, some, such as State Senator Scott Brown, did not support the increase.

Despite some opposition, PHENOM stated, "Contacting senators now, while the budget is up for amendments will play an important role in legislative budget decisions."

SGA ties loose ends in 6-hour meeting

By Mike Fox
Collegian Staff

Last Wednesday night, the Student Government Association (SGA) senate held a six-hour meeting during which a consensus was formed on the issue of online voting for future SGA elections, a new speaker of the senate was elected, a new chancellor of elections was appointed, the Student Activities budget for 2009 was passed and several presidential cabinet appointments were announced.

The most controversial issue of the night was over a proposed amendment to the SGA by-laws that would provide for elections to be conducted online. Former Chancellor of Elections Sean McNair presented a petition signed by over 2,000 students that asked the SGA to institute online voting. In addition to online voting, he presented additional amendments that provided for more clear guidelines in the election process.

While presenting the amendments, he argued that they would help the SGA attain more legitimacy and encourage more involvement on the part of the general student body. Central Area Governor Dave Robertson assisted McNair in his testimony, arguing that other schools such as the University of Nebraska have experienced success with similar systems.

The initial concerns voiced by senators, such as ALANA caucus-appointed senator Subhan Tariq, centered on the fear of potential voting fraud, such as the possibility of over-the-shoulder voting occurring. McNair and Robertson countered this by stating that strict punishments for this practice would be in place and that other schools haven't developed issues with it.

Additionally, as to the concerns of so-called voting parties, in which an individual would organized a group together to vote for an incentive, it was stated that time stamps on each vote would help investigations into this practice.

At this point, the senate moved to debate the motion. Orchard Hill Senator Ben Thompson in his argument against the motion took offense to McNair's criticisms of the current SGA, refusing to acknowledge McNair's comments that most people see it as a "joke."

Commuter Senator Modesto Montero also argued against the motion, stating that as it was the last meeting of the year, senators weren't given enough time to review the proposed amendments. However, he did submit a motion requesting that if the amendments were passed, online voting would be operated on a trial basis.

Following these comments, McNair, Robertson and Commuter Senator Chelsea Aquino, reiterated their support for online voting, saying it will to allow for easier opportunities to vote for a greater campus population. McNair also emphasized the fact that he has been trying to submit the motion for a large part of the semester but was unable to see it move to the senate due to the alleged inactiveness of the Administrative Affairs Committee.

Following this, Speaker Shaun Robinson called the senate into recess, during which a heated debate broke out between McNair and several opponents of online voting. Each side accused the other of letting personal beliefs over responsibilities to the SGA inform their debate.

After the recess, several more senators took the stand. Commuter Area Senator Will Syldor stated that he agreed with "the fundamental idea of online elections," but accused McNair of bringing the issue forth "in a divisive and personal way." Commuter Area Senator Derek Khanna than took the podium in defense, attacking Senator Syldor's alleged ignorance of the motion and proceeded to read through the entire proposed amendment.

At this point, Senator Tariq submitted a new piece of legislation co-authored with McNair. The new motion, which was approved, agreed that the SGA would support moving elections online. To compromise, Tariq said, in reference to the steps provided for by the motion, "That system [online voting] would be determined in the future and would help to increase voter turnout many fold. We feel that this is an incredible step forward for our University as we look to increase voter turnout in all SGA elections."

McNair stated, "I'm pleased that the leaders of the SGA have finally recognized the need for our government to shift to an electronic voting system. This is what the students want as well as what makes the most financial sense."

He also had choice words for his debating partner, Governor Robertson. "Governor Dave Robertson of Central has worked tirelessly this year on behalf of his constituents but also on behalf of all students by fighting for things like the electronic voting system. His enthusiasm and dedication is, in my opinion, something that exemplifies what a student leader should be."

Following the compromise, SGA President Ngozi Mbawuike announced the consolidation of the Secretary of Public Policy & Relations into an Outreach Coordinator and the creation of a new Secretary of the Environment. Additionally, she appointed Kelly Anne Curley, a former member of the Center for Education Policy Advocacy, as the new Secretary of Administrative Affairs and Shahna Lee James, the former chair of the Senate Administrative Affairs Committee, as the new Attorney General.

Patrick boosts aid to unemployed teens

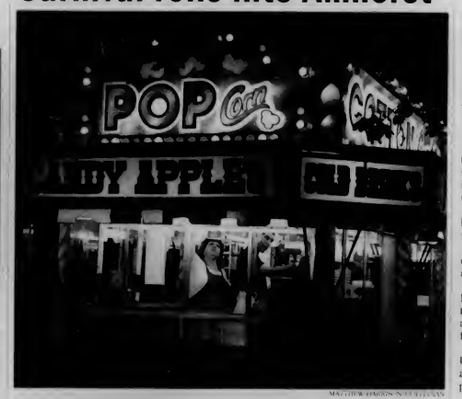
Gov. Deval Patrick has pledged stimulus money for youth jobs.

Governor Deval Patrick has pledged $21 million in federal stimulus money to subsidize summer employment among youth in Massachusetts. The recovery effort will use federal funs to expand existing state employment programs and create new ones in the hope of subsidizing 10,000 summer jobs for youth between the ages of 14 and 24.

The YouthWorks program, which subsidizes the employment of young people from low-income families in cities such as Boston, Worcester and Springfield, will be expanded to more communities across the state. Jobs for young people who do not fall into the YouthWorks demographic will also be subsidized. A particular area of focus will be working on infrastructure, such as roads.



But not all are convinced.

"I would say that putting money into jobs for 14-year-olds is unnecessary. If a 14-year-old can get a job that's great, but less money should be going to jobs for 14- to 24-year-olds than 18- to 24-year-olds," said Sean Toland, 18, a student at the University of Massachusetts.

Massachusetts recovery money is going mostly to technology subsidies, education and a "safety net" of welfare programs to the tune of $1.3 billion, $ 2 billion and $3.5 billion. Labor and Workforce development will receive $90 million.

UMass warns against waste in move-outs

By Rebekah Diamond
Collegian Correspondent

Students have seen beer cans and empty water bottles tossed on the side of the street or littering the woods thousands of times before. For some people this scene may instill some bit of fleeting anger, but for others, it goes unnoticed altogether.

For junior Rebecca Standard, who does recycle, this kind of scene is all too common. She said that while her friends have recycling bins, they often do not use them.

"I will go over and see the recycling bins practically empty, while the trash is overflowing with bottles, cans and paper in addition to trash," she said.

Scenes like these are what officials in the University of Massachusetts Office of Waste Management (OWM) are trying to prevent. Recycling programs in the dormitories and public buildings are helping to reprocess everything from beer cans and water bottles to computers and books.

In fiscal year 2008 the recycling rate at UMass was at approximately 56 percent, according to OWM. That number is relatively high compared to other colleges and universities, said Lorenzo

Macaluso, special projects coordinator for the OWM.

But the office said students are not aware of the impact they can make by recycling. There also does not appear to be any consistency between what living areas recycle better at a given time.

"There is no rhyme or reason to why one dorm does better," said Macaluso. Professor John Gerber, who teaches a sustainable living class, frequently takes his students to the waste management site on campus.

And once at the site, they're surprised, he said.

"Students are not aware of the world beyond their dorms," Gerber said.

Besides taking waste out of the landfills, recycling helps reduce greenhouse emissions. The recycling cans tossed by students in one semester would save enough electricity to run 10,000 TVs for 139 hours. Students recycling all their paper would prevent over 20,000 pounds of air pollution and conserve 140,000 gallons of oil each semester, according to OWM.

"One water bottle may not be a lot, but when you put them together it adds up," said Gerber.

Gerber practices what he preaches.

Instead of carrying his liquids around in a plastic bottle, he carries them around a thermos. He keeps a chocolate milk plastic bottle in his office. He said he sometimes gets a craving to buy milk, but then he looks at the bottle and decides not to buy one. In the waste stream, a plastic bottle may take up to 1,000 years to disintegrate depending on the kind of plastic, whether it is in a damp area or in sunshine, he said. And, he cautions, even when plastic bottles are recycled, they cannot be used in the same capacity because they lose quality.

All University paper is divided into two categories. The first is called "high grade" paper and it comes from academic and administrative papers. The "low grade" paper comes from the living facilities such as dorms. At the plant this paper is put into separate bins where it is then sent to the Materials Recycling Facility (MRF) in Springfield, Mass. It is here that the paper goes through another sorting. This time any high grade paper that got mixed in with the low grade paper while it was in the dorms is removed.

Standard thinks that students know the importance of recycling, but they often are not motivated to do it.

"I feel that everyone knows how important recycling is, yet for the typical college student recycling falls at the bottom of their priority list," she said. "Finding ways to motivate people to go out of their way and use the extra energy is key."

DEGAN TEITELBAUM/COLLEGIAN

UMass official John Pepi stands in front of a UM waste management vehicle at the facility on Tillson Farm Rd.

Motivating students is difficult and very subjective, but there are other ways that OWM is trying to reach out to the campus community. There has been confusion about recycling trucks that have the same appearance as garbage trucks taking recyclables away. That perception alone can cause students to doubt the legitimacy of the recycling on campus.

The plant has taken steps toward distinguishing the trucks by attaching "recycling" signs Macaluso said.

To further encourage the practice of recycling, OWM goes to the RA fair every year where they offer preassembled displays for the RAs. Since many RAs are required change bulletin boards in their halls every month, the promotion works as a way to illuminate the recycling projects. These displays feature pictures and facts about recycling.

Gerber does not think that students are interested in hearing professors talk about environmental issues, and he said that many environmentalists use scare tactics to get the community to recycle more. But Gerber has adopted his own unique approach for educating the community on the environment.

Instead of preaching, he uses reverse psychology. He asks: "Do you love where you live? Do you respect yourself?" If you love where you live, you will make the effort to take care of it. If you respect yourself and others around you then show it by managing your wastes properly. His hope would be that people come to this conclusion without ever hearing scare tactics. He thinks that student participation would be greater if they were educated by their peers. The University does have one such program called Eco-Rep. It consists of students who are assigned to freshman dorms using their influence as upperclassman to bring awareness to environmental issues. They do this through slideshow presentations, group activities and informational flyer distribution.

Campus recycling is part of a bigger trend that is occurring at colleges all over the country as schools take steps toward "going green."

The Princeton Review added a new category it its annual guide to colleges – a "green rating," which gives points to colleges with environmentally preferable food, power from renewable sources and energy efficient-efficient buildings. Magazines and websites are also getting involved in nominating the greenest college. According to an article in The New York Times, 63 percent of college applicants surveyed said that a college's commitment to the environment could affect their decision to go there.

OWM is currently working on a "bail out" campaign, referencing situations at which students leave and throw out tons of garbage. More trash is thrown out in May than in two or three months combined. Macaluso recognizes that May is a busy month for students as they prepare for finals and try to move home, but he offers a few suggestions. He said that students should start going through their files early, recycling papers and anything they will not bring home.

Princeton University ready to test out new Amazon Kindle

BY HYUNG LEE
THE DAILY PRINCETONIAN

Princeton will partner with Amazon com to provide students and faculty members in three courses with the new Kindle DX electronic reader next academic year as a part of a sustainability initiative to conserve paper, according to a University statement. Sponsored by the University Library and the Office of Information Technology (OIT) and funded by the High Meadows Foundation, the pilot program will provide the devices to students free of charge.

Amazon CEO Jeff Bezos '86 unveiled the new e-reader – which has a larger screen and is slimmer than the original Kindle introduced in November 2007 – during a news conference at Pace University on Wednesday. The company also announced plans to fund classroom trials of the product at Princeton as well as at Pace, Case Western Reserve University, Reed College, Arizona State University and the Darden School of Business at the University of Virginia.

Drew Herdener, the company's director of communications, said in an e-mail that, for the company, the aim of the university partnerships was to "see how useful a wireless reading device can be for students," adding that "the participating schools are still working out the details of their respective pilots."

While other universities also announced similar programs, Princeton's project is unique in that it will focus on sustainability by reducing the amount of electronic-reserve course materials that students print.

"Over 10 million pages were printed out in cluster printers [last year]," OIT director of academic services Serge Goldstein said, adding that "a lot of that is students printing e-reserves." He emphasized that the other schools partnering with Amazon were more focused on providing students with textbooks on the e-readers rather than reducing paper use on campus.

"These devices have a screen technology that is really designed to optimize the reading experience," Goldstein said, adding that students print e-reserves rather than read them on their computers because "laptop screens are not designed for supporting lots of reading."

Housed in a thin, white frame, the Kindle DX offers several improvements over the current version – the Kindle 2 – including a larger display that measures 9.7 inches across and PDF reading capability, which will allow students to read e-reserves scanned by the library. The device can hold up to 3,500 books, and users can download texts from Amazon's online store via a wireless connection.

The new version will cost $489, compared to $359 for the Kindle 2.

With the devices provided by the pilot program, called "Toward Print-Less and Paper-Less Courses: Pilot Amazon Kindle Program," students will be able to search and annotate their readings, Goldstein said.

"We are going to be working with the library to scan material in Optical Character Recognition form," he explained. Because the documents will be in this form, students will be able to annotate them using the Kindle's keyboard and five-way controller, which acts like a joystick.

"Most of the material will be flowable text," Goldstein added. "It's actual electronic text. You can actually search it."

Still, the e-reader's annotation capabilities may pose a challenge to students, Goldstein said, explaining, "We think that annotating on paper is easier." He also noted that paging through paper documents is much quicker than perusing those texts on the Kindle because there is a short delay before the next page can be displayed on the device.

"A whole bunch of things we'll find to be problematic," Goldstein said of possible disadvantages of the console. "There are no perfect devices out there yet."

While talks of a pilot program began two years ago, when Amazon first approached the university, the current project didn't fully materialize until six months ago, when Amazon decided to proceed with the program, Goldstein said, adding that $30,000 of funding for the project will come from the High Meadows Sustainability Fund, which was founded by Carl Ferenbach '64. Amazon will match the amount donated by the fund.

"We believe we can support about 50 or so students plus the faculty and a few staff who also need the device … about 60 devices in all," Goldstein said.

Janet Temos, the director of the Educational Technologies Center at OIT, said she expected Amazon would expand its online coursebook offerings.

"I know they're working on that," she said. "It's an unspoken part of the agreement."

Once the book lists for the three selected courses are finalized, the university will also send a list of texts to Amazon so the company can make the textbooks available for download through the Kindle Store, Goldstein said.

Students who find the Kindle a poor substitute for their course materials will still be permitted to print e-reserve documents.

"We don't force technology on people because we think it's cool or bleeding edge," Temos said. "If it turns out that it's not working, we'll abandon it."

The three courses that will use Kindles next fall will be announced by the end of the month, Goldstein said, adding that the university chose to wait until after course registration closed to make the announcement.

"We didn't want students signing up for classes just to get a Kindle," he explained.

History professor Anthony Grafton, who researches the history of books and currently uses a Kindle 2, said he thought the program was "a little premature."

"[The selection of books] actually available on the Kindle is not very impressive," he said. "I do think they will need to do some work on what's available before it's totally satisfactory."

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Melissa Turtinen

This is the first time that I'm not jealous when all of my friends get out of school weeks before UMass for summer – thank you horrible schedules because I'm not ready to leave this place.

People say that I'm scared of life.

I'd say that's a bit of an exaggeration; I'm scared of change and I'm scared of being wrong and I don't like when things end. A bit of a pickle I have myself in, seeing as though my collegiate career is nearly over, I have no idea what I'm doing with my life and I hope that I didn't make any wrong choices thus far.

I know, though, many choices I made were the right ones.

I came to the University of Massachusetts from Minnesota – so much for a person who is scared of change. It was the scariest thing I had ever done. I'm surprised after first semester freshman year I stayed. But I knew that, if I transferred schools, I would have been "wrong" in choosing UMass and everyone who doubted me would be able to say "I told you so."

Wow, I'm glad that I'm stubborn. I just needed to get used to my new home, and that's what UMass became – a home.

I joined The Massachusetts Daily Collegian in spring 2007, and after a year I became an assistant sports editor. I knew I had made the right decision – not just to help my future career aspirations, but because I met people that changed my life forever.

The people at the paper became my best friends – and the worst influences. I skipped classes, went out too often and was never prepared for class. But I have never had more fun and I don't regret getting my worst GPA ever last fall. Going home on breaks, I couldn't wait to get back to The Collegian – not working at the paper necessarily, but the people.

Coming to college, I never thought I would meet people that would be able to replace, or be equal to, my friends from home. But my friends at UMass have truly become my family, from everyone at The Collegian, to friends from freshman year (Adrianne – there you go), to the sisters of Alpha Chi Omega, to the journalism department. All of you have made my college experience that much better and I thank you for that.

I didn't think anything would be better than my senior year of high school – I don't think I've ever been so wrong. My four years at college have been amazing. I've learned more about myself, about the world and about others than I ever thought possible. That's the point of college, right?

I've always heard that these are supposed to be the best years of your life, and so far, they have been. This is the first time that I'm not jealous when all of my friends get out of school weeks before UMass for summer – thank you horrible schedules because I'm not ready to leave this place. The homework yes, but friends, college, no.

I'm in the position of many of those who are graduating: I'm clueless and I'm going to miss the life of a college student. So right now, I guess you could say I am scared of life. I'm nervous, anxious, excited and terrified to see what my life brings, what I end up doing and where I go. I'm scared, but I'm oh so excited.

I keep trying to think about what I could possibly do for my last weekend in Amherst that could wrap up my life there. The nagging desire to do everything one last time is overwhelming.

I didn't plan on going to the University of Massachusetts. I talked to a UMass representative during my junior year of high school. It seemed OK. But every time the school sent me information in the mail, my last name was spelled "Czarber." I took that as a sign I shouldn't go to a school that, while trying to recruit me, equated my last name to a Russian figurehead. I was cutting my losses before it was too late.

When I was younger I was terrified of tornadoes. This might not seem relevant. While researching the telltale signs of tornadoes (green sky, funnel clouds, etc.), I came across a little known fact: Massachusetts has the least number of tornadoes in any given year in America.

My college search was pretty superficial. I didn't care enough to look past location and school newspaper status. I had ruled out UMass, but my mom's best friend had visited with her daughter a few years back and loved the school. This was solely because of the duck pond. So, on a trip to see my sister play field hockey in Vermont, my mom insisted we detour to Amherst to check out the cesspool that UMass calls the campus pond.

We got there too late to catch a tour. And, although it was only October, it was already snowing. But I was impressed by the 28-story library. I little did I know how few books occupied each floor. So on the basis of The Daily Collegian, the Holyoke mountain range and the W.E.B. Du Bois library, I applied to UMass.

I wasn't going to go to graduation. I spent my last semester of college in Thailand and I planned on staying all summer to travel. But I'm indebted to UMass. My flight home now leaves me with less than 24 hours between arrival in the states and graduation. I'm not even going back to my house. I go straight from four months in Thailand to Amherst.

I keep trying to think about what I could possibly do for my last weekend in Amherst that could wrap up my life there. The nagging desire to do everything one last time is overwhelming. Even this column, disjointed as it is, written 11 time zones apart, serves as my last words for The Collegian.

It's hard to conclude my college career outside of the newsroom, outside of the hemisphere. I guess it's safe to say despite the circumstances that brought me to UMass, Amherst has left me with those warm fuzzy feelings. To put things in perspective, after four months deprived, I want to earn my weekly beer income from Trivia Night at The Harp.

A couple days ago I visited a man named P'Hekbamrung. He works as an NGO [non-governmental organization]. In Thailand NGO's are oddly enough individuals. He poured me a cup of local, Isaan beer, complete with ice because every drink in Thailand has ice, and told me that it was the best in the world. He said Isaan beer, like the Isaan people, has been marginalized.

He said I have tried other beers so my memories stop me from enjoying Isaan beer. He told me that I need to "strike a balance between my internal and my external beings before I can be partial."

He told me, "Every beer is good for different people, different tastes and different memories."

I think that applies to a lot of things.

These crazies went after their dreams and goals with wild abandon. Showoffs. I mean, really, who wants to be burdened with having little character flaws like integrity and motivation?

Welcome, my esteemed colleague, to Generation Apathy.

Also known as the Millennials, the MySpace Generation, iGeneration or whatever. Gen A's can be found constantly checking their email, IMing people from across the room, "friending" people they don't actually know, and, perhaps mostly, being unable to go two seconds without updating their Facebook or Tweeting to some "friends" or tagging pictures and LOLing.

Most importantly, Gen As are defined by their completely profound lack of caring.

There's roughly 100 million potential Gen As or Apathetics or whatever-you-want-to-call-them in the United States right now (that is, anyone from their teens to late 20s). Fortunately, some hold no illusions. Some care about what happens in the future, some want to make a difference. I know, it's hard to imagine, but think about it: for each of these 'doers,' these 'go-getters,' there's one less person that will get in the way of you doing what you love: nothing.

Remember when your parents told you things like: "You can do anything you want" or "You're the most important person?" Well, these lousy showoffs, these non-conformists were told the same thing, they just didn't get sidetracked like someone else we both know. These crazies went after their dreams and goals with wild abandon. Showoffs. I mean, really, who wants to be burdened with having little character flaws like integrity and motivation?

Good thing you aren't going to let that happen. Wait, are you? Well, I guess you can if you really want. It's too much effort for me to stop you from gaining some dignity or for thinking about the consequences of your actions. Isn't it so much easier to just not talk about boring things like global warming or the genocide in Darfur? It's alright if you'd rather talk about that party last weekend. You know, the one you really don't remember all that well? That's the one.

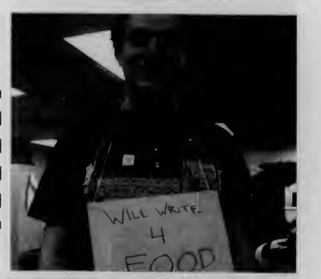
That's the important stuff, right there. Screw doing things in the real world. Screw political or social change. Screw being pro or anti anything. Screw actually letting sunlight into your room.

But that's just Generation Apathy. We're highlighted by… Hm. By… ah… really, it's on the tip of my tongue…

Well, let's see. The G.I. Generation had WWII, the Baby Boomers had Civil Rights, Generation X had the end of the Cold War. Generation Apathy, however has… Oh yes, that's right, we have a shit-ton of cell phones; and the internet. Both of which rock pretty hard. I mean, they totally define us. Our need for instant access, our desire to… do cool stuff like… chat online or… play World of Warcraft or… not need to leave our cloistered lifestyle.

As members of Gen A, we have everything we need and nothing at all. We have the ability to stay connected, to use all of this technology to shape and change the future, but, looking around, all I can see it being used for is Facebooking and IMing and Tweeting and texting.

My, how the G.I.s and the Boomers and the Xs would have shook things up with the same equipment. Imagine how different the Civil Rights Movement would be with a tool as powerful as the internet. Wowee!



So, you… yeah, you, remember when your mother said you could do anything you wanted? Well, she lied. As long as you don't get up and out of that comfortable reclining leather chair, as long as you continue sending text after text after text or checking your Facebook every thirty seconds, you aren't going to accomplish much. But, then again, it's the real world. Who really cares?

Ben Williams

The world is too big to have it all, but too full to be disconnected from; you will always be lonely and never be alone. Smile often and never doubt that, by being compassionate, you have the power to make the world a better place. If you do anything, do this.

They told me I would have 700 words to say whatever I want. So, I wanted to tell you the two most important things I have learned while spending four years here, at least, the things that are on my mind now.

First: There is very little in life that is not about being in the right place at the right time. Getting a job, getting promoted, finding someone you love, discovering what to do with your life, all these things have less to do with what you know or what you do than is comforting to think about.

So my advice is that of a wise man named Daniel Pinkwater who said that it is impossible to know when the right time will be, so the important thing is to find the right place and just hang around for a while. This is true. There is not a whole lot you can do. But, you can do your best to put yourself where you want to be, and seize whatever opportunities come along.

The other thing I have learned takes some explaining, so bear with me for a moment and just imagine:

There are more than 6 billion people in this world, a number so large it is practically infinite. Imagine all the people who you know, even vaguely, by face alone. If you went to a big school or worked somewhere with a lot of people or came into contact with a lot of people in a day, you might imagine you would know 10,000 people by face at the end of your life. Now imagine how many people you know by name, just first name – maybe in the thousands at most. Now imagine all the people who are loosely considered your friends – maybe in the hundreds.

Now in that small subsection of the total number of people in the world, in that one 600,000th of the number of people in the world realize you have found every kind of person and every relationship you can imagine. There are people you like, dislike, are creeped out by, people who love you, admire you, despise you, people you lust after, you loath, you love deeply. And you can imagine that, if you took another 10,000 people you would find the same. Why wouldn't you?

The thing is that it is simply impossible for all of these people who might be your friends or your lovers or anything else, to be a part of your world. They are a part of their own world, and part of other people's worlds, and you may only intersect with theirs briefly, but probably not at all. The vast, vast majority of the world you will probably never even see.

I mention this because we rarely consider the vastness of the world, or even other people for that matter. We are often concerned with the very small amount of what is tangible to us, and forget that there is an inconceivable number of other people who are going through exactly what we are.

So I urge that there is really only one thing to do.

It is to keep your heart open. To deeply touch the lives of everyone you meet. To fall in love a hundred times a day or more and let it go; that's all you can do. The world is too big to have it all, but too full to be disconnected from; you will always be lonely and never be alone. Smile often and never doubt that, by being compassionate, you have the power to make the world a better place. If you do anything, do this.

I wanted to thank The Massachusetts Daily Collegian from the bottom of my heart for giving me this, and countless other opportunities. And also for proving (daily) that a group of people dedicated to a common goal have only their imaginations as a limit to what they can accomplish, truly.

Thank you to my friends, who continually remind me of the basic goodness in people when I forget.

Thanks to everyone I've met, who made this what it was. It has been wonderful.

To those of you I haven't met yet, bon voyage, and I hope our paths cross sometime in the future.

Play 'Bare'-ly misses a beat

UMass Theatre Guild delivers controversial performance

By Michelle Frediette
Collegian Staff

When asked what she would like audiences to know about the University of Massachusetts Theatre Guild's performance of "Bare," director Ilana Toeplitz said, "Well first of all, this show contains strong language and strong sexual content: definitely not for your grandparents or younger siblings!"

The Guild's performance Friday night at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall certainly pushed the envelope even more than the play's already-suggestive content.

"Bare," the story of two homosexual boys struggling to come out in their Catholic high school environment, includes male-on-male kissing and adult name-calling like "bitch" and "whore."

The Guild took great risks by having Kate Jones (Nadia) change on stage during "Quiet Night at Home," utilizing a penis-shaped piñata during the birthday scene, and ending act one with Ivy (played by Lisa Bettencourt) bent over a table by Jason (Christian Hoots), as if being taken from behind.

Yet the suggestive aspects of the show – because they were done with seriousness and kept in context with the script of "Bare" – were tastefully executed, if a little shocking. The Guild dealt with the difficult subject matter of the show with maturity and grace, preventing it from seeming silly or vulgar.

"I wanted to direct this musical because I had never heard of it, meaning 'Bare' had the opportunity to be something completely organic and fresh," said Toeplitz. "The audience will enter with little to no preconceived notions, unlike the expectations that would come if we were putting on a well-known show like 'Phantom of the Opera,' 'Grease!' or 'Rent.'"

Toeplitz was correct that the ignorance about the show worked in the Guild's favor. The show's denouement was especially powerful because it was unexpected by the attendees.

However, the cast infused their performances with emotions essential for such a sensitive topic.

The main characters of "Bare" are multi-faceted, which demanded actors who were adaptable. Jones had to be sassy, jealous, a little nasty yet caring, all at different points throughout the show as Nadia, just as Bettencourt had to be snobbish, cruel, desperate and vulnerable as Ivy. Both pulled off the changes superbly, able to stay in character while morphing into a different emotion.

Michael McSweeney and Christian Hoots, as Peter and Jason, respectively, also portrayed their characters well, both speaking and singing with poignancy.

Both set and choreography were simple, which was appropriate for the show's tone.

"The show took on a bit of an abstract form," said Toeplitz. "I believe that theatre set in a less specific space allows the audience to subconsciously 'fill in the blanks' with what they can relate and identify with."

This unspecific space worked well, as boxes transformed from beds to altars to confessionals throughout the show with only a slight alteration of props or placement, allowing the scenes to change without a need to slow the pace for set alterations.

Toeplitz's choreography, which drew heavily and fittingly from positions of prayer, complemented the songs well for the most part. During Peter's song "Role of a Lifetime" the chorus' marching about stage got faster as Peter became more emotional, and while the idea was good the jerky movements instead felt distracting.

However, Toeplitz knows when to keep things subdued and when to shake it up, as the dancing for "911! Emergency" was wonderfully peppy. Michaela Kinlock and her backup dancers were able to keep it perfectly synchronized.

While the main characters were always audible, the chorus often got lost underneath the orchestra. This was especially noticeable during the scene where Peter tries to tell his mother over the phone that he's gay, as Peter rang out clearly but none of Claire's words came through. The problem didn't detract from the performance overall, but it did provide some annoyance.

Despite the small issues, "Bare" was well-performed and accompanied skillfully by the orchestra, conducted by Ben Rauhala.

"To me, 'Bare' is about people and their struggles and the ramifications of judgment. It's about cleaning up our messes. It's about Catholicism. It's about old world ideals versus contemporary society. It's about how we all serve as walls and obstacles in each other's mazes as we fight struggle towards absolution," said Toeplitz.

That's a lot to cover, but Toeplitz and her cast pulled it off with aplomb.

New BYOB opens in downtown Amherst

By Cal Scannell
Collegian Staff

At Amherst's newly opened restaurant, Mango Mango, the coconut curry arrives accompanied by the light and soft aroma of cardamom with heavy stew-like undertones.

The dish is described as a Malaysian-style curry served over couscous. However, in addition to the Asian and Middle-Eastern influence, the dish carries an equal amount of French influence, with hearty vegetables including zucchini, potato and carrots.

The curry is subtly spiced making it a safer pick for less daring diners and can best be summed up as experimental comfort food. Even in such a substantial dish as this, there is nothing to hide, and with most of the menu items at Mango Mango, there is no place to hide - the vegetables are never overcooked, making it exceedingly difficult to disguise over-ripe eggplant or wilted greens.

While dining in the casual atmosphere of the restaurant, customers will never have to question the freshness or integrity of the ingredients in their dish.

Mango Mango, which opened about a month and a half ago, offers a wide variety of fusion cuisine, inspired by culinary traditions from all over the world. Located at 61 Main St., Mango Mango doesn't serve alcohol but instead allows customers to bring their own.

The menu has an east meets west vibe reflected in items such as the Japanese curry, the Colombian sweet potato stew and the tilapia naan entrees, as well as good old steak and potatoes. Additionally, diners can select from their extensive sandwich line-up including the roasted chicken with guacamole and apple and the open-faced steak bruscetta sandwich or opt for one of the many soups and salads also available.

The restaurant has opened under the same management as Fresh Side in the space where Fresh Side used to stand, before moving to its current location on North Pleasant Street. Similar to Fresh Side, the Mango Mango menu focuses on health with a large emphasis on freshness. The menu also includes a number of vegetarian and vegan options and almost any item may be adapted to fit certain dietary restrictions.

"We created items here that are somewhat unique and are very health-conscious," said owner Kent Chu on dreaming up the concept for Mango Mango.

In place of mayonnaise for example, he uses flavorful spreads such as hummus or guacamole. He uses a newly discovered meat substitute that is mostly soy-based, flavored with non-meat items, which in terms of flavor and texture, tastes just like chicken.

Though in some respects Chu draws on his Taiwanese background for inspiration, he looks to a broad number of places in creating the unique dishes Mango Mango boasts.

"Here, there is a mix of ideas and a mix of experiences to come up with the food…inspiration just comes from everywhere, sometimes from staff, sometimes from customers, sometimes just from talking with friends, or from eating out, or looking at magazines, so there is a combination of places that I absorb ideas from. Always it's a collaborative effort," he said.

For instance, prior to its opening, Chu recalled that he prepared "tons of sandwiches for all the staff to get their input on every aspect, whether or not the bread fit the sandwich, whether or not the cheese worked."In the past he has also been known to hold naming contests for new dishes.

In Mango Mango, Chu aspired to create a quick and casual eatery that would offer diners a unique culinary experience. While he is considering expanding to more locations in the future, he remains unwilling to sacrifice the quality and customer service that he cultivates in his restaurants as he moves forward.

"I don't think [McDonald's] could do it, I don't think Panera could do it, so that's how we want to set ourselves apart," said Chu. "I want our staff to be sensitive to our customers and sincere. That way Mango Mango will set us apart from other establishments."

Director Ramin Bahrani returns to the screen with "Goodbye Solo," the heartwrenching tale of a Sengalese cab driver and an elderly passenger. In March, the film was released with limited distribution.

Crusty coot goes 'Solo'

By Ann Hornaday
The Washington Post

One of the most cheering cinematic trends of late is the blossoming of a style that could be called American postindustrial neorealism. Filmmakers such as Kelly Reichardt ("Old Joy," "Wendy and Lucy"), Courtney Hunt ("Frozen River") and Jake Mahaffy ("Wellness") are making movies that, like those of Italian neorealists of the 1940s, are deeply rooted in their time and place, giving viewers by turns harrowing and poetic glimpses into life as it is lived, right now.

The master of the movement is Ramin Bahrani, an American of Iranian descent, who made a quietly sensational debut in 2005 with "Man Push Cart," following it up with an even more accomplished sophomore effort, "Chop Shop." Bahrani's new movie, "Goodbye Solo," offers further proof that he is one of the best reasons to keep going to the movies.

As "Goodbye Solo" begins, a Senegalese immigrant named Solo (Souleymane Sy Savane) is driving a cab in Winston-Salem, N.C., and picks up an elderly passenger named William (Red West, best known as a member of Elvis Presley's "Memphis Mafia"). William asks Solo to pick him up in two weeks' time, then deliver him to Blowing Rock, a windswept peak in the nearby Blue Ridge Mountains.

At first Solo makes light of the mysterious request, but he quickly becomes convinced that William needs a friend. Brimming with optimism and convinced that his personal version of the American dream is just within reach, Solo reaches out himself, to a man who's already on the downward slope of that dream. Solo soon insinuates himself into William's life, at one point even rooming with the older man in a motel room when Solo has trouble with his wife (Carmen Leyva). But inevitably, William's two-week deadline arrives, and the men must face exactly what their friendship means.

"Goodbye Solo," which Bahrani wrote with Bahareh Azimi, unfolds with such ease that it's hard to believe it wasn't entirely improvised. And although in other hands the relationship between the crusty old coot and the expansive immigrant would devolve into too-cute set pieces, the film takes turns just as unexpected as Solo's taxi.

With a subdued sense of purpose, Bahrani measures out bits of information that make his characters increasingly fascinating. (Solo's adventures with William are livened up considerably when the former's 9-year-old stepdaughter, played with admirable assurance by Diana Franco Galindo, comes along for the ride.) But the core of "Goodbye Solo" is what transpires between Solo and William – one an unstoppable force of faith and compassion, the other an unmovable object of grim finality. And that transaction is nothing short of miraculous, as fragile connections are made and lost and made anew.

Like all of Bahrani's films, "Goodbye Solo" is visually simple and stunning, especially the haunting nightscapes of Solo's perambulations (like Bahrani's other films, this one was shot by cinematographer Michael Simmonds). But more important, "Goodbye Solo" is driven by deep feeling and sensitivity. Don't miss it.

Sending baseballs over the wall was a theme at Earl Lorden Field over the weekend, much to the dismay of Atlantic 10 rival, Rhode Island.

The Massachusetts baseball team took the series from the Rams despite losing the first game 11-7 in 10 innings. UMass took Saturday and Sunday's game 10-9 and 10-3 respectively.

Senior designated hitter Jim Macdonald was a key contributor, hitting a grand slam on Saturday and a two-run home run on Sunday.

"I was seeing a lot of inside fastballs and I just turned on them," Macdonald said on Sunday. "Luckily there were guys on base. Yesterday with three runners on and today with one on, that helped out a lot."

Coming to Amherst, Mass., the Rams were leading the A-10 with a 17-3 record. Three games later, URI now finds itself second in the standings behind Dayton. With the win, the Minutemen became the first A-10 team this year to take a series from the Rams, improving to 21-24 overall and 13-11 in conference play.

The Minutemen launched six home runs in three games, most of which proved to be very important.

Friday's extra-inning thriller marked the series opener for the two teams, as a devastating tenth inning home run burned the Minutemen. Taking a 7-2 deficit into the bottom of the eighth, UMass refused to go quietly as junior Brian Baudinet led of the inning with the Minutemen's first home run of the series. A gutsy rally followed, tying the game at seven.

A scoreless ninth brought the game into extra innings, and it didn't take long for Dan Khault to show why he is Rhode Island's M.V.P. Stepping up to the plate with the bases loaded, Khault remained patient before depositing the 2-2 offering over wall in right center field. The Minutemen went on to lose, 11-7.

Saturday's game was similar, except it was the Minutemen who benefitted from clutch home runs. Losing 5-2 going into the bottom of the fifth, Macdonald added a grand slam of his own, giving the Minutemen a 6-5 lead. Sophomore Kyle Multner and junior Mike Donato also hit home runs en route to a 10-9 victory.

Sunday's rubber match wasn't as close as its predecessors, as the Minutemen rolled to a 10-3 victory. UMass got to Rams starter Eric Smith early, as Macdonald hit a two-run home run in the bottom of first.

"Offensively we came out strong – Jim had the big home run early in the first inning and set the tone for everybody," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

After surrendering a run in the second, Multner led off the bottom of the third with a home run to spark the Minutemen's three-run inning. With two outs, Macdonald doubled, scoring Adam Tempesta from first base. Mike Donato capped off the inning with a single, scoring Macdonald.

The extra cushion was all Jared Freni needed, as he pitched five and a third innings, yielding three runs and four strikeouts. It was a complete performance for UMass, which currently represents the final team slated to play in the A-10 tournament.

"We did a great job from the start," Stone said. "Offensively our approach was good against a really good pitcher. A lot of people came to see him pitch and Jared Freni showed them maybe they should have been watching him pitch," he said.

With four games remaining before the A-10 tournament, UMass clings to a 1-1/2 game lead over St. Louis and Temple, who will try to upstage the Minutemen for the final spot.

"We still got work to do in preparation for the A-10," Stone said, "but if we continue playing like this, we're going to be in good shape."

M. LACROSSE from page 8

was to get back to this spot – where we thought this program should be," Schneider said. "It's been great and we definitely have something that we built here and we want the underclassmen to kind of take that to the future."

After a strong first 10 minutes of the third quarter, when the Minutemen cut the lead to 8-5, a future in the second round against fifth-seeded Cornell seemed like a distinct possibility. Fiorito's hot start went away, star senior Jim Connolly scored twice and Schneider and the UMass defense held ground.

But Kovler was simply too much.

His late third-quarter goal once again extended the lead to four and stopped most of the momentum the Minutemen had gained. What was left of it vanished quickly in the fourth, as UMass served four penalties in the opening 5 minutes, 14 seconds of the final period to allow Princeton to dominate possession and run the clock.

"It kind of took the wind out of our sails when we had a lot of momentum," Cannella said. "Some of those were bad fouls, but they were effort fouls, so you can't really knock these guys. They were trying their hardest and make a play [to get back into the game]."

Perhaps the most costly UMass penalty came in the second period. After Schneider made a sprawling save on a Kovler shot, the Minuteman goalkeeper fell backwards as the ball flew into the air. While lying on his back, Schneider reached up and swatted the ball away again, but the officials ruled that it crossed the line for the goal and a 5-1 lead.

Schneider argued and was called for an unsportsmanlike conduct penalty, sending him off the field and backup Mael Walkowiak into the game. UMass successfully killed the penalty, but before Schneider could come back into the game, Kovler struck again with 35 seconds remaining in the half to increase the lead.

Despite a 19-5 edge in groundballs in the third quarter, UMass only outscored the Tigers by one goal. The Minutemen successfully killed off four penalties in the fourth quarter but with the Tigers dominating possession it was already too late.

Connolly finished with four goals to end his senior season with a team-high 39, but was the only member of the UMass offense that could get anything going. Tim Balise, Evan Blum and Bobby Hayes all scored one against Fiorito, who made 12 saves.

Rich Sgalardi added a hat trick for Princeton, who also got one each from Scott MacKenzie and Tommy Davis.

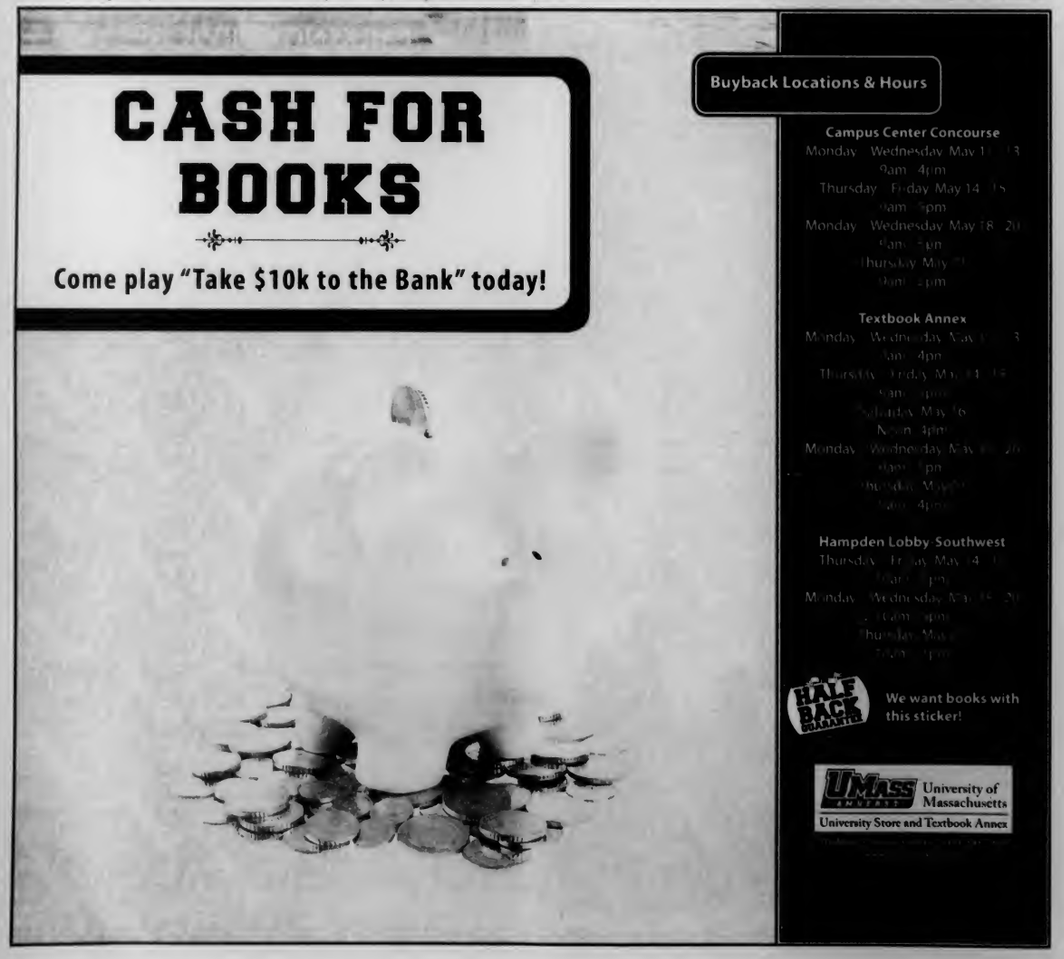
Northwestern goals before halftime as the Minutewomen trailed 16-5 at the end of the half.

"We came into this game prepared, we knew what to expect, but unfortunately we couldn't stop them right from the start," Venechanos said. "When it was 6-3 [Northwestern] we had some momentum, but we didn't get the next three or four draws and 6-3 turned into a bigger [deficit]."

Before the game, the Minutewomen talked about how important draw controls were to staying competitive. UMass reasoned that if they could keep Northwestern from getting several possessions in a row, the Minutewomen might keep the game close. Dominance in the draw circle is one of the reasons why the Wildcats are undefeated, and Sunday was no exception as they finished with a 23-8 advantage on the draw.



"Their sticks were [on the ball]. No matter where we went, their sticks were there. We tried our best, but we didn't come up with as many [draws] as we usually do," said Reddy, who had a single season record 77 draw controls coming into this game, but couldn't get one against NU.

Stephanie Hopkins scored the lone goal for UMass in the second half as the Wildcats poured in seven more scores.

With the 2009 season now over, UMass must look to the future. They will lose two captains, senior defender Jackie Rosenzweig and senior attacker Holly Drown, in addition to Reddy. These are big losses, but 21 of their 24 players are returning, including leading scorer Jackie Lyons (44 goals, 27 assists) along with 14 freshmen, as the Minutewomen hope to build and return to the NCAA Tournament.

"What we have to do now is build on momentum for next year's team. We're going to miss the seniors, but we will look to continue the hard work that this team had this season," Venechanos said. "I think just getting to the tournament and understanding all the preparation that goes into it is hard to substitute. I'm very proud of this team; they are a very special team."

UMass falls, program rises

Late comeback not enough as UM falls in first round

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PRINCETON, N.J. — The origin of Jonathan David Schneider's nickname, "Doc," still remains a mystery. But according to Princeton men's lacrosse coach Bill Tierney, one thing is quite clear: the Massachusetts goalkeeper is the best in the country.

The senior stopper just won't be able to prove it anymore.

The comeback season for UMass ended Sunday night, as the Minutemen fell to the fourth-seeded Tigers, 10-7, in the first round of the NCAA Tournament at Class of 1952 Stadium in Princeton, N.J.

Schneider made 13 saves for the Minutemen, who couldn't quite come back from a 6-1 halftime deficit. That didn't stop Tierney from praising the UMass stopper.

"Doc, that guy, if he's not the best goalie in the country than maybe our guy [Tyler Fiorito] is," Tierney said. "It's tough scoring on that guy. So to get double figures on him and to be up 6-1 at the half, we really felt good about that."

Led by the career-high five goals from Mark Kovler, the Tigers (13-2) ended UMass' streak of five consecutive NCAA first-round victories – dating back to a 1997 loss also to Princeton.

The Minutemen dominated play in the third quarter and cut the lead to three multiple times in the second half, but Kovler continually answered back with timely goals.

The 2009 season was a remarkable turnaround for UMass (9-6), a program that went a combined 12-16 over the previous two seasons after a 2006 national runner-up finish. The Minutemen rebounded this year with an Eastern College Athletic Conference championship and NCAA berth just 15 months after an off-campus incident resulted in the removal of eight players from the program.

All of what UMass accomplished after a tumultuous 2008 season was not lost on Cannella or his seniors.

"I give the credit to the seniors for bringing us back to the spot we're here today. They put a lot into [this team] to get the guys connected and looking out for each other. They made sure guys went to class and behaved off the field.

"They did such an awesome job for that and I thank them for that."

Schneider, who entered the game ranked second in the NCAA in save percentage, wouldn't reveal how he got his nickname but also reflected on what the senior class accomplished.

"It's good now that I don't have to hear about freshman year anymore. Our main goal

Despite it all, season cut short

After benchmark season, NU defeats UMass in first round

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has accomplished a lot this season – winning both the Atlantic 10 regular season title, and then rallying from a seven-goal deficit to win the A-10 Tournament, en route to the program's first NCAA appearance since 1984.

They have made remarkable strides, but the Minutewomen's first round matchup against four-time defending championship Northwestern shows just how hard it is to build an elite program in collegiate women's lacrosse.

The Wildcats (20-0) offense was too much for UMass (11-9) to handle, as the Minutewomen lost 23-6 in the opening round of the NCAA Tournament late Sunday afternoon. The Wildcats advanced to the second round where they will host Princeton next week, as the Tigers defeated Georgetown 15-9 Sunday to advance.

"It was tough, we played really hard, but Northwestern's a great team and they played an unbelievable game today," freshman goalkeeper Katie Florence said. "I'm proud of the way we fought all the way through for 60 minutes, but in the end, they just controlled the game."

Florence made 15 saves, preventing an even more lopsided result. Northwestern outshot UMass 44-18 for the game, including 19-5 in the second half.

"Katie Florence continues to be one of the most consistent goalies I've ever coached," UMass coach Alexis Venehcanos said. She is very level-headed, she was getting lots of shots and she stood in there strong and kept us the game early. Unfortunately we just gave up too many shots and we [couldn't score]."

Katrina Dowd led the Wildcats with seven goals, Hannah Nielson scored four goals and two assists, and Mary Kate Casey notched a hat trick.

UMass fell behind by five goals early before back-to-back goals by sophomore attacker Haley Smith and senior midfielder Meghan Reddy (who scored UMass' first goal) cut NU's lead to 3-6 with 21 minutes, 27 seconds left in the first half. It appeared that the Minutewomen had stopped the bleeding, but Northwestern promptly answered with an 8-0 run to put the game away. UMass did not score its fourth goal until Nina Sarcona found the net with 3:24 left in the first half.

Minutewomen win 21st A-10 Title

Conference title belongs to UMass for fifth-straight year

BRONX, N.Y. — Dani Gonzales of Saint Joseph's stood in the circle at Bahoshy Field, failing to fight back the tears.

The senior realized this would be her final collegiate softball game.

Gonzales pitched her team to four straight elimination-game victories to advance the Hawks to the Atlantic 10 Championship Series against the Massachusetts softball team, but the streak would end there. The top-seeded Minutewomen ended the fifth-seeded Hawks' hopes at an automatic berth into the NCAA Tournament with an 11-0 five-inning rout as they won their 21st A-10 Championship.

Winning the tournament advances UMass (38-8, 19-2 A-10) to the NCAA Tournament for the 15th straight year and 19th overall. UMass will host the first round NCAA Regional despite being the two-seed in its bracket. The three other teams in the Amherst bracket will be No. 3-overall seeded Washington, Sacred Heart and UMass' first opponent Cornell.

On top of being the 21st A-10 Championship for the Minutewomen, it was their fifth-straight and 14th in 15 years. But despite the recurring ending to the A-10 seasons, it never gets old to UMass coach Elaine Sortino.

"Are you kidding me? This is the best day of the year so far. To know that we walk through the door and into the NCAA Tournament, that we got our conference championship, it means the world to me," Sortino said. "People just don't understand, I don't expect it. No one knows how hard it is to do it, I do."

The ace of St. Joe's staff – who had pitched 30 innings through the first five games of the tournament, including a complete game shutout against Charlotte right before facing UMass in the championship series – had given up four runs through the first three innings to the Minutewomen, still leaving her team within striking distance.

"Today I think we got her quick and we kind of took the life from under her feet," Sortino said of Gonzales. "I think our kids had a great game plan, we knew what to expect from her because we had seen her before and I felt we really executed at the plate, but I think she did an outstanding job for St. Joe's."

But in the bottom of the fourth, the Cinderella Hawks (27-20, 12-8 A-10), who lost the first game of the tournament to send them to the losers bracket, unraveled as UMass sent 13 batters to the plate and score seven runs.

UMass catcher Jessica Serio led of the inning with a double to left field – she also hit a two-run home run in the second inning – and was lifted for pinch runner Jill Andrews. Andrews stole third and after a Davina Hernandez strikeout and Carly Normandin walk, scored when shortstop Whitney Williams hit her second home run of the tournament to put UMass up 7-0.

The lead, then, wasn't insurmountable, but after three errors and a hit batter the lead became nine, then 10 on a Serio single – her second hit of the inning and third of the game – and finally 11 runs on a Michelle Libby single up the middle.

Lauren Pembleton headed to the mound from the bullpen, taking the ball and relieving the teary-eyed Gonzales. Pembleton walked the next batter but induced a ground ball by Williams to end the inning.

Gonzales pitched 3-2/3 innings, giving up 11 runs – seven earned – on nine hits, three walks and a hit batsmen. The senior started all six games of the tournament for the Hawks going 3-2 in six starts, pitching 30-2/3 innings giving up 23 runs – 19 earned – on 37 hits, seven walks while striking out 27.

"[Gonzales] did what she needed to do on the mound and I think her team did a great job of hitting the ball through every game of the tournament except for this one," Sortino said.

Gonzales had a rough start to the tournament, but settled down in her two games on Friday and first game on Saturday as she went 3-0 with 19 strikeouts in 21 innings while giving up four runs. Her performances were a large reason why the Hawks made the championship series and earned her a spot on the All-Tournament team.

Joining Gonzales on the All-Tournament team was three of her teammates as well as five Minutewomen: Williams, Serio, Sarah Reeves, Whitney Mollica and Brandice Balschmiter.

Balschmiter was also named the tournament's Most Outstanding Player for the fourth consecutive year, tying a record held by former UMass pitcher Danielle Henderson.

The award came after Balschmiter went 3-0 in the three starts in the tournament, pitching 19 innings. The senior gave up one earned run on eight hits and four walks with 21 strikeouts through the tournament, but her best performance was her last as she was nearly perfect.

Against the Hawks, the four-time A-10 Pitcher of the Year gave up a single hit – a weak ground ball that hit off her glove and rolled to her left – and hit a batter as she pitched the five-inning shutout and struck out eight.

"I thought today was an A-game [from Balschmiter]," Sortino said. "I knew as soon as she hit the glove with the first pitch it had to be 70-something miles-per-hour and I thought that she was bringing it."

The Minutewomen advanced to the championship series with a 2-0 win on Friday over Charlotte on back-to-back sixth inning home runs from Williams and Mollica.

UMass hosts NCAA Reg.

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD

Despite going through the Softball Selection Show process three times, Brandice Balschmiter still felt uneasy.

"I didn't have any expectations coming into tonight," Balschmiter said. "I just had a stomach full of butterflies, really nervous coming in and anxious to see what would happen."

Balschmiter and the rest of the No. 20 Massachusetts softball team learned their fate – hosting overall No. 3 seed Washington, Sacred Heart and Cornell – in the upcoming NCAA Tournament Sunday night as they watched the selection show from coach Elaine Sortino's living room.

"I could be happier, but I'm glad we're hosting – that is awesome," Balschmiter said after seeing where the selection committee placed UMass. "We have a great field amazing fans and a good school to play with to host. I'm a little anxious and a little nervous at this point but I'll take it just one game at a time."

For the Minutewomen (38-8) it is the fourth straight year they will host an NCAA Regional and their 15th straight NCAA Tournament appearance. But despite hosting the regional, UMass is the two-seed in their bracket. Due to NCAA regulations, Washington – the No. 1 seed of the regional – has to play on the road due to limitations with their field.

The regional will kick off on Friday, May 15 and go through until Sunday at the UMass Softball Complex. Washington will square off with Sacred Heart (25-26) and UMass will take on Cornell (42-11) on the first day of the double-elimination tournament. Washington (41-10) is the only team out of the Minutewomen's three possible opponents that Sortino and her players have seen play this year.

"I don't know anything about Cornell, I know they hit the ball really well, but I have no other information about them," Sortino said. "I know nothing about Sacred Heart and we saw Washington play Florida at the Palm Springs Tournament so we got a scout on them. We are going to have to do some massive digging around."

For UMass to make the NCAA Super Regional, or round of 16, for the second time in four years, senior Whitney Mollica believes the team needs just one thing, great defense.

"The most important thing is that we have to play good defense," Mollica said. "We have great pitching, Brandice is a great pitcher and we have two other great pitchers in store, we have good hitting but we have to play good defense. It's the only way we are going to stay in games."

Commencement events announced

Alumnus Earl W. Stafford to give speech

BY LISA DEBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Undergraduate Commencement ceremonies for the University of Massachusetts' Class of 2009 are scheduled to take place Saturday, May 23, and approximately 4,000 UMass students will receive bachelor's degrees.

"Commencement is the time to recognize the accomplishments of our students, to celebrate exemplary academic performance, and to honor outstanding alumni and friends of UMass Amherst. It is also a time to offer congratulations to students, their families and friends," Chancellor Robert C. Holub said in a statement.

The Undergraduate Commencement will be held at McGuirk Alumni Stadium from 12:30 p.m. until 2:30, immediately followed by a cookout hosted by Holub in tents north of the stadium.

Speaking and receiving a Distinguished Achievement Award at the ceremony will be alumnus Earl W. Stafford, a Virginia businessman and organizer of the "People's Inaugural Project."

"Stafford is the epitome of a self-made man and has found remarkable success while never losing his innate grace, humility and enormous capacity for hard work," said Patrick Callahan, associate news editor at the UMass Office of News and Information.

Stafford earned his bachelor's and master's degrees at UMass in business administration while spending 20 years in the U.S. Air Force. After leaving, he started the company Universal Systems and Technology, Inc. (Unitech), which eventually grew into a 300-employee company with over $150 million in annual revenues.

After retiring in 2008, Stafford established The Stafford Foundation, a philanthropic organization. The Foundation's first project was to organize the "People's Inaugural Project," which helped to send 1,000 disadvantaged citizens to join them in celebrating President Barack Obama's historic inaugural ball in Washington, D.C.

Stafford's volunteerism extends to UMass as well.

"His ongoing loyalty to the campus is reflected in his service as a founding director of the board of the UMass Amherst Foundation," said Callahan.

Robert B. Brack, an alumnus and businessman, and Aaron D. Spencer, founder, director and chairman of UNO Chicago Grill pizzerias, will also receive Distinguished Achievement Awards.

The chancellor, UMass President Jack Wilson and UMass senior Jackie Hai will also speak.

In addition, 13 graduating seniors will be recognized for winning the University's 21st Century Leaders Award for academic merit and accomplishment: Ivan A. Bercovich, electrical engineering and mathematics major from Jamaica Plain, Mass., August Siena Thomas, a linguistics and BDIC major from Montague, Mass., Laurene Dykiel, a chemical engineering major from Acton, Mass., Abigail Lyn Harper, a public health sciences major from

Ski team to be cut, lose varsity status

BY NIINA HEIKKINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On April 2, University of Massachusetts skiing coach Skip Fox got the call that he had been dreading. It was 9:15 that Thursday morning, when Athletics Director John McCutcheon asked Fox to come into a meeting. Two hours later, sitting around a conference table in Boyden Gymnasium, with his skiers and the athletic department administration, Fox received the bad news.

The men's and women's alpine ski teams would be converted to a club team next year, the athletic director told him, and Fox had been "separated" from the University.

"It was an emotional meeting," said Fox. "I thought we would fly under the radar, but that wasn't the case."

Fox had hoped that his teams' athletic and academic achievements would help save them. Last year, the men's team had won the United States Ski and Snowboard Association (USCSA) National Championships, and this year, the women's team had tied for fifth at Nationals, held in Winter Park, Colo.

"I was expecting it a little bit, but I was still in shock," said Fox. "We kind of thought that we were in the clear, because we heard the day before that the baseball team was getting cut, but then we were called into the meeting the next day. A lot of people completely freaked out," said sophomore Amy Gifford, who placed 20th at Nationals this year.

Five UMass skiers were named Second Team All-Americans this year, including both the men's and women's captains, seniors Alex Zahoruiko and Emily Shilletto. Four of the five UMass women competing at Nationals were chosen for the Academic All-American Team.

Fox is now looking for a new coaching job, and the UMass alpine skiers are trying to make the transition into becoming a club team with no University funding and no coach to guide them.

"I don't think the administration realizes how good our team is. They don't value skiing. They don't understand it," said Fox.

McCutcheon said one of the reasons for cutting the ski teams over other sports teams was because the skiers would be able to compete at the same level as a club.

Fox, ski team alumni and student-athletes strongly disagree with this sentiment, arguing that losing varsity status will have a huge and irreversible negative impact on the skiers' ability to be nationally competitive. They argue that they will no longer be able to recruit new talent to the school.

"It wouldn't make a difference in competitiveness this coming year," said Gifford. "We have all juniors and sophomores [for next year], but no one is going to come out for skiing if we are just a club."

The greatest impact comes from losing National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) recognition, which will bar UMass skiers from competing in NCAA championships.

"If they are cut from varsity," said Michael LeBlanc, division chair of the McConnell Division in which UMass competes, "UMass will lose the opportunity to go to Regionals and Nationals." LeBlanc is the head ski team coach at Brown University and former UMass ski team coach (2001-2003).

According to McCutcheon, the athletic department faced a

'Framework' released

Holub plans for the future

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When Chancellor Robert C. Holub addressed the University of Massachusetts faculty in his inaugural address last September, he emphasized the idea of "leaving the past behind."

Holub has recently announced his formal plans for the University's future in a document called the "Framework for Excellence."

The Framework, released to the University community on April 16, is a plan of how to boost the University's reputation.

It was drafted by the chancellor, with input from faculty and staff.

"This document outlines the high-level considerations necessary to move us to the cadre of the very best public research universities in the country," the communication reads.

The Framework combines an analysis of the University's current position on a variety of levels, coupled with Holub's vision for the school and a loose set of details about how to get there by the year 2020.

He plans to increase the size of the faculty, as well as both undergraduate and graduate student enrollment.

"I think, broadly, people are supportive of the direction we want to head toward," UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said. "The question is what path we will take to get there."

The framework provides a blueprint for how the University should allocate its limited resources, as it was written in the context of the current budget deficit.

However, many of the proposed improvements are dependent upon an increased operating budget, specifically the upgrading of academic programs, boosting of faculty re

The chancellor acknowledged in previous interviews that the current economic situation would most likely delay many of the plans he has for the campus.

Instead of immediate improvements, the University may find itself in a position of preserving programs for several years until the operating budget can be consistently increased.

Yet the document emphasizes Holub's belief of the critical importance of a strong faculty in attaining the status of a top-tier research university.

"The prestige of this campus rests, to a great extent, on the research and creative activity conducted here," the document reads.

Holub also acknowledged that the departments with the most promising research prospects would be given funding priority, especially those most likely to receive federal and state grant funding.

Despite the strong tone of the document in support of faculty research productivity and graduate education, some members of the campus community expressed concern that the Framework deprioritizes undergraduate education.

Holub plans to increase the student body to approximately 22,500, while simultaneously increasing the amount of out-of-state students both as methods to boost revenue.

"The plan is to, over time, grow the campus," Blaguszewski said. "It would not be to reduce the number of in-state students."

But more students, specifically more out-of-state students,

UM partners with Google

GMail and other Google Apps to be available next semester

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Over the past decade, Google has slowly worked its way further and further into the everyday lives of anyone who frequents the Internet.

Starting next semester, the University of Massachusetts will team with the public corporation to bring its' unique brand of information technology tools to the school's student body. Starting in late summer 2009, UMass undergraduates will be able to use their university e-mail (or UMail) addresses with the full Google Apps suite of productivity software.

The company has recently redesigned Google Apps for use by educational institutions, and it has already been embraced by schools like Northwestern University, University of Southern California and Arizona State University.

"[The University] decided upon Gmail and Google Apps after a study of options for an e-mail system to help us meet our rapidly growing needs and students' expectations," John Dubach, chief information officer at the UMass Office of Information Technology (OIT), said in a statement.

"Google Apps stood out because it offers cutting-edge technology and a high level of service. Because Google offers this service for free, we'll be able to refocus our IT resources on other projects."

Gone will be the days of "mailbox over quota," which plagues many UMail users. Currently, many students are unable to receive e-mails without deleting messages perindically from their account once they exceed the 30 MB limit now in place.

Google will offer students over seven GB of e-mail storage, a massive increase in mailbox capacity that will allow students to save and archive mail over time, and send large attachments with ease.

UMass students will also be able to collaborate on work in new ways. By next semester, they can begin working together online, using software like Google Docs for documents and spreadsheets, Google Sites to create websites and Google Calendar to schedule events.

The Google system will allow for increased student cooperation on projects, and further integration of university services into student life.

The transition to Gmail will take place over the next semester, with undergraduate students receiving the option to switch to Google. Starting in the spring 2010 semester, it will become the standard email for all undergraduates.

Ski program dropped

$850,000 budget shortfall for next year due to a permanent state budget cut of $600,000 and other expenses. The budget shortfall represents about 4 percent of the total athletics budget of $21 million.

With these financial realities, McCutcheon said, budgets for each of the 21 varsity teams were reduced by 3 percent.

"We pulled the belt as tight as we could, but there was still a [budget] gap to be addressed," he said.

In order to find a way to address that gap, McCutcheon met with Jaime Seguin, the associate executive athletic director and other administrators to review all the varsity teams, considering "gender equity, Title IX issues, competitive aspirations, as well as NCAA and conference membership requirements," according a press release announcing the cut on the ski teams' website.

Title IX is a federal law passed in 1972 that states "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

The shortfall in the Athletic Department's budget is a reflection of the financial problems that plague the rest of UMass.

UMass Chancellor Robert C. Holub said in a message to the campus community that the University faces a potential loss of $46 million for the coming fiscal year. It is unclear how much state funding the University will receive.

Most of the $46 million deficit is expected to be covered by temporary aid from the federal stimulus package as well as revenue from projected fee increases. The University is now paring down its budget for the next fiscal year by $10 million said Ed Blaguszewski, the executive director of News and Media Relations for UMass.

"If we were to avoid reductions now, then the institution could face destabilizing and even disastrous budget cuts in two years," said Holub in the statement. "To avoid taking this step, therefore, would be not only imprudent, but irresponsible."

According to Holub, the main priority of the University is to preserve the quality of education by avoiding lay-offs of professors and trimming administrative and support staff costs.

Programs like alpine skiing become especially vulnerable during difficult economic times as administrators must look objectively at which programs they can afford to keep and those they cannot.

The most money goes toward supporting teams like football, basketball and hockey, which not only bring the most prestige to the school, but also provide much-needed revenue through ticket sales.

This fiscal year, the UMass Athletics budget for the football team was the highest at $3.5 million, followed by men's and women's basketball ($2.4 million and $1.4 million respectively) and hockey ($1.3 million). The men's and women's alpine skiing teams was the second-lowest funded team (after men's and women's cross country) with a combined budget of $100,780, according to budget data acquired under the Freedom of Information Act.

For a few colleges and universities around the country, cutting varsity skiing seemed like the most economically sensible option.

In March, Whitman College in Walla Walla, Wash., cut its men's and women's alpine ski teams shortly after they returned from successful individual competitions as the USCSA Nationals. The college saw a 30 percent reduction in its endowment last year, a total loss of $100 million. As a whole, the school is preparing to reduce its operating costs by $2 million for the coming school year. Varsity skiing was one of the most economically draining sports at the school, eating up 95-100 percent of the entire varsity travel budget last year, according to an article in the Whitman College Pioneer.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge, Mass., eliminated a total of eight of its 41 varsity sports on April 23, including alpine skiing. MIT athletics faced a budget shortfall of $485,000, representing 5 percent of the athletics operating budget of $9.7 million. The Institute plans to reduce its total budget by 10-15 percent or $100-150 million over the next two or three years, according to an MIT press release.

While supporters of the UMass ski team say they understand the economic necessity of cutting costs during a recession, several people interviewed said they objected to how the decision to eliminate the ski team was made behind closed doors, without consultation with the teams or coaches.

"In my opinion, it wasn't handled appropriately," said Patrick Kelly, UMass ski team alumnus of 2006. "They cut them, and they walked away ... It is irresponsible to cut a successful, low-funded team just to say you are making cuts."

"The coaches were informed the process was going on, and Skip came in and made a case for his sport," said McCutcheon in response to the criticism.

Kelly is now helping to lead a last-ditch effort to get the ski team re-instated by the University. Along with other alumni and parents, Kelly helped create Friends of UMass Skiing, a non-profit organization that has worked over the past month to come up with an economically sustainable plan for privately funding the team. They have prepared a formal report they plan to present to the board of trustees and UMass President Jack M. Wilson. In a group e-mail, Kelly urged the members of Friends of UMass Skiing to write letters to state senators to try to get more funding for the program.

"We're not just going to roll over," said Kelly.

The Friends of UMass Skiing's goal of re-instatement seems idealistic, and even as they speak passionately about their goal to save UMass skiing, the Athletic Department has moved on from the decision to cut the team.

"We are not willing to reinstate based solely on external support. ... Is there any guarantee that this support will continue down the road? It's just not practical," said McCutcheon.

So far, parents of current skiers have contributed $30,000, and they are asking for pledges from alumni and Friends of UMass Skiing by May 15, Gifford's father, Donn Gifford, said in an e-mail.

Even though Gifford would rather compete at the varsity level, racing on the UMass Alpine Ski Team will have to suffice.

"We've all been doing this for so long. I don't know what we would do with our winters. I would rather ski, than not ski, even if we're not competitive. We don't have a choice," she said.

would ideally boost revenue at a higher proportion than the requisite increase in expenses to educate these additional students.

Holub also plans to increase the graduate population, in addition to significantly boosting the number of doctorates awarded each year.

"Our graduate population is too small for an institution that aspires to be among the best public research campuses in the United States," Holub wrote.

In addition to on-campus changes, Holub hopes to boost the reputation of the University in the eyes of the state legislature and potential alumni donors.

As with his predecessor John V. Lombardi, Holub intends to make fundraising a key aspect of his administration.

The document's status as an unfinished product has led the chancellor to actively collect feedback from the campus community via the "Office of the Chancellor" portion of the UMass website.

"It's a starting point for discussion to move the University forward," Blaguszewski said.

Several sections have already been changed based on feedback, including several paragraphs characterizing Commonwealth College, the University's honors program.

Collegian Staff 2008–2009

Alex Waszczuk

The next few weeks are going to be a difficult time for me. Getting ready to say good-bye to so many people, half of whom I will most likely never talk to again. It is one of the lessons I have carried with me – that of change.

Where to begin?

I was new to The Daily Collegian in 2008, assuming the role of business manager. The learning curve was steep and it took quite a bit of time and effort to figure out exactly how the business worked. Through everyone's hard work, though, this past year will be one to remember. We significantly changed The Collegian's organizational structure, improved upon the quality of the paper, reduced our debt and are on pace to make a small profit for the year.

I want to take this opportunity to thank everyone for their contribution to The Collegian on a daily basis. Whether you are a writer, ad rep or editor, you made a difference in 2008-2009.

I do want to single out two people for their contributions: Dan Hurley and Michael King. Dan, without your hard work as the advertising manager I am quite sure The Collegian would no longer exist. There were several moments this past year when both of us got frustrated with the direction we were heading, but you stayed the course and helped us persevere. I will never forget that.

I want to thank our editor in chief Michael King for his tolerance of my antics in the office; it was something of a miracle. Any sane person would have fired me within the first two weeks for insubordination. The value that Mike has brought to The Collegian, from his leadership to work ethic, is something that cannot be measured.

This year was not all about making a profit and improving the financial standing of The Collegian; it was also about growing as a person and making personal connections. I met an interesting bunch of people while working in the dungeon that is our office. These are people that I would not have normally met in my travels around campus. I am proud to call several of my co-workers friends of mine and plan to stay in touch with them after graduating.

I strongly recommend that anyone reading this get involved in some way at The Collegian. It doesn't matter if you're a business major, English major or engineering major; there is something you can gain by getting involved. I have taken several life lessons from my short time with the paper and I'm sure that my co-workers will agree.

I do have one regret, and that was waiting until the spring semester of my junior year to apply for a job at The Collegian. I wish I had decided to get involved sooner.

The next few weeks are going to be a difficult time for me. Getting ready to say good-bye to so many people, half of whom I will most likely never talk to again. It is one of the lessons I have carried with me – that of change.

I am quite nervous about the future of The Collegian, just like several of the executive board members of last year were nervous about leaving the paper in our hands. We rose up to the challenge and left the new group in a better situation than we were handed last May.

I am confident, however, that the new group of students who will be taking over in the fall will rise to the challenge as well, and even surpass our expectations of them.

Alex Waszczuk was the business manager at The Daily Collegian. He cannot be reached because he doesn't want to deal with you punks.

Brendan Cherry

In all seriousness, this has been a great experience top to bottom. To anyone I missed here, don't take it personally.

As many of my teachers can attest to, I am not so much a reader as I am a writer; and to be fair, I am not even much of a writer. With that in mind, you could imagine my surprise when I was asked by the former assistant advertising manager, Emily Nichols, if I would like to apply to work at The Collegian.

It was during a car ride to "Spider-Man 3" at the end of my sophomore year that she asked that fateful question. I regretted my decision to watch "Spider-Man 3," but working at the Collegian is a decision I am happy I made. I applied for the position of advertising representative not really knowing what it was about, but I hit it off well with the ad manager Alex Bender. What caused this cosmic connection?

Was it my finest can of Phoenix Axe that sealed the deal? Maybe, but more likely it was my friendship with another person in the room, coupled with my uncanny ability to sell. Alas, I am sitting here writing this now with graduation looming large and unemployment looming even larger.

What can I say about The Collegian that hasn't already been said?

When I started here I was partnered with Dan Hurley. He was a great partner and still is as I am the Cher to his Sonny. Not in a love sense but in a business sense. Michael Jordan had Scottie Pippen, and Dan Hurley had Brendan Cherry. Beyond our incredible business sense, we share a common interest in stuff; which leads me to believe we will be chatting into our 80s, maybe even come back down here next year for a few "celebrity sells."

Hurley and I have had some times down here and seen some things. Joe Saracco, a well known conservative, but perhaps better known for his networking and his ability to shine the rust of a '78 Chevette with nothing but a tooth brush and the spit God gave him; continuously provided humor until he quit in a fiery blaze. First day on the job he accidently called 911 twice. Oh boy, did we have a laugh! He's a good kid, though. So here's to the past staff that blazed the trail for this year's staff.

Speaking of this year's staff, hot dog; a 7-team wrecking machine! The economy was tough, but I am proud to say Dan and I presided over a staff that was even tougher. Mikey T, Lizzy J, Nicole J, Pam, Katie, Sweet Julie, and Liam … thank you for your efforts and if you ever need a letter of recommendation you know who to see. Last but not least, Alex Waszczuk (WaHz Check!); here's a guy who will buy the bar a round and tell everyone it came from someone else. A gentleman's gentleman who insured success down here, he has earned the moniker Exter 2.0! (Just kidding, Dan).

In all seriousness, this has been a great experience top to bottom. To anyone I missed here, don't take it personally. I wrote this in five minutes while simultaneously playing Snood, I didn't mean to be rude; but a sincere thanks to everyone that kept the Collegian printing.

If you need to reach me I will be in the grad lounge with Meloni and Tim the Collegian dean. Good luck to all, and to all, good luck.

Leigh High Football rules!

Dan Hurley

I had never been a manager of anything before and all of a sudden I had a staff of eight. We had some really good times in the business room, though, and I can't believe that it is already nine months later and I'm handing the reins over to Mike Tortorici.

I have never been one to "get involved." I've always just done the bare minimum.

Coming to the University of Massachusetts, I never had any intentions of joining any Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) or anything like that. When I came to The Daily Collegian my sophomore year, it was just a job for me. Three years later, it has basically consumed my life and I'm not that upset about it.

I don't really know what to write in my senior column, mostly because it hasn't really hit me that this is really the end.

Three years ago, I came down to The Collegian to apply for a position in the classified advertising department and got the job. I would read all the newspapers and chat with Marty Pappas, who was my boss in the classified department. She would sit with me all morning and talk about everything from current events to just random stuff in my life. It was Marty who I have to thank for pushing me to apply to be an advertising representative, which was one of the best decisions I have ever made.

In my second year at The Collegian, I was the Northampton and Springfield advertising representative with my partner, the one and only Brendan Cherry. That was a really fun year for me.

Every Friday, Cherry and I would walk up and down the streets of Northampton selling Collegian ads and we were pretty damn good at it. One day we even went to the local strip club to try and sell ads. Brendan and I walked into this place and sat down with the owner at the stage and gave him our whole hit and we killed it. This was one of our first big sales. We ended up selling more than $1,500 worth of ads to him, which the owner subsequently refused to pay for.

Later on in the year, I decided to apply for the advertising manager position. I got the job and hired Brendan as the assistant advertising manager. This was a crazy experience for me because I had never been a manager of anything before and all of a sudden I had a staff of eight. We had some really good times in the business room, though, and I can't believe that it is already nine months later and I'm handing the reins over to Mike Tortorici.

I know this is very cliché, but I have a few people I would like to thank. First I would like to thank my staff this year. You guys really did a great job and the paper would not survive if it weren't for you.

Thank you to Stapes and the classified girls for making me laugh every morning with random notes, to-do lists, YouTube videos and for doing a great job and, believe me Nichole, I will teach you how to drive some day. Thank you to the Executive Business Manager, Mr. Alex Waszczuk for also making me laugh every day down in the office. You were quite the stress ball but you did a great job at keeping the paper afloat in this economy and I think we made a pretty good team.

And, of course, thanks to this year's executive board for making things fun down here while at the same time keeping this paper on its feet.

I would also like to say good luck to my successor Mike Tortorici. You have an uphill battle ahead of you but I know you'll do a great job.

Dan Hurley was the advertising manager at The Daily Collegian

Joe Meloni

Boom.

I applied to four other schools during my senior year at Stoughton High School; still, Michigan was the place for me. Everything I did, every club I feigned interest in and every essay draft I tore apart and rewrote was all in hope of convincing the right number of admissions officers that I belonged in Ann Arbor.

In early February of 2004, I received a letter in a small envelope with the University's seal on it. Small envelopes spell doom in the world of college admissions. I tore it open waiting for the inevitable rejection before receiving a faint slice of hope – i had been waitlisted. The letter advised me to keep my grades up because my application would be reviewed again shortly.

The rejection later came two months later. My enrollment letter to UMass, the first of four colleges I would gain acceptance to, was postmarked the next day. It wasn't Michigan, but there is enough distance between Amherst and Stoughton, Mass., to keep me from spending every weekend at home.

UMass wasn't part of my plan, but it worked out in the end. After five years, three perfect ones spent in the gloomy Collegian newsroom, I'd like to thank whoever made the final call in Ann Arbor for rejecting me.

All I wanted to do was make money.

I stayed diligent in my schoolwork. Good grades meant a good job. A good job meant money – money was everything. I listened to professors who spent their entire professional lives as accountants cranking out numbers or consultants deciding who was valuable enough to keep their jobs.

After a year and a half, my grade-point average was lofty. But when I actually thought about what I had learned, I couldn't come up with much. I'd acquired no skills, no relevant knowledge. All I knew was that if I wrote what professors told me to write and finagled my way in and out of math classes, I would be fine.

As the spring 2005 semester began, I knew my departure from the UMass Isenberg School of Management was imminent. I enrolled in a journalism class and fell in love with the profession within a month. There was something beautiful about the pieces we read. I imagined myself in a press box during Game 6 of the 1975 World Series and how my version of Carlton Fisk's home run would have read, or how Boston Bruins fans would remember Bobby Orr's game-winning goal in Game 4 of the 1970 Stanley Cup finals if they read my game story the next morning.

I didn't come to college with the intention of becoming a "news jock," as journalism professor Ralph Whitehead calls those who dedicate their lives to The Collegian, but I can't imagine my time at UMass had I not. There are countless journalism students with better GPAs than mine, but none of them have what I have down at The Collegian.

None of them know a group of people who they share a professional and personal life with. None of them spent their time in college interviewing Nobel Prize winners or flying to North Carolina in the middle of finals with two of their best friends to cover soccer games or driving to Buffalo, N.Y., in the middle of winter to cover a weeklong swim meet – or dancing to Whitney Houston while standing on a chair in Charlie's during one fateful Collegian Bar Crawl.

I like I said, their grades are better than mine. But I didn't come to college to get good grades. I came here to grow and get an education.

It just so happened that I did most of that in a gloomy basement-turned-newsroom with a bunch of people that quickly became my family.

A gloomy basement that will always be in my heart, a gloomy basement that, no matter where I end up, will always be my home.

But this past year was really something special. Not every day was a holiday, nor was every decision easy to make. But we did it.

How can one place, one organization, one group of people mean so much to an individual? That's the question I'm confronted with as I reflect on my past three years at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

It's incredible how one thing, so special, can define much of who you are. But not to mislead, I have no regrets.

I mean sure, I've missed out on standard parts of the college experience. I never got around to studying abroad, or to pursuing other extracurricular interests; and of course, I suffered the requisite GPA slide that comes with committing oneself to the Campus Center basement.

Yet, I wouldn't do anything differently.

Serving as a staff writer for three years and leading the paper as editor in chief for two semesters have been incredible experiences – incomparable to any other I've had. I've learned more about myself even in this past year than I have from any academic experience.

Looking back four years ago as I entered college as a young, naive freshman, I had little idea that three years later I would be leading New England's largest college daily. In fact, I didn't think journalism would characterize even the smallest part of my college career.

All it took was a simple sign at Worcester Dining Commons that expressed The Collegian's need for a sports writing staff. I remember thinking to myself, "I like sports and I like to write, so why not?" And, of course, this small twist of fate precipitated one of the best decisions of my life: to join The Collegian.

Along the way, I've created memories here that I'll never forget. Whether it's the many awkward confrontations with the chancellor while pursuing comment for budget stories; or the epic disaster of a trip to Cary, N.C., to cover the men's soccer team with a grumpy Joe Meloni; or the many heated discussions about revenues, expenses and misstated financials I had with my business manager Alex Waszczuk in the war room – several of which resulted in a few slammed doors, some unnecessary expletives and even a few tears.

But this past year was really something special. Not every day was a holiday, nor was every decision easy to make. But we did it. We had a fabulous year in all aspects of the newspaper despite having the cards stacked against us in many cases.

To our staff: I'm proud of where we came from and even prouder of where we went. We left this newspaper in a better position than where we found it. And to me, that is the true meaning of success.

To everyone I've worked with over the past three years, it's been a pleasure sharing The Collegian as a home with you all. Though we come from different backgrounds and offer something different, we all have one commonality: a commitment to something greater than oneself, a commitment to making The Massachusetts Daily Collegian the best publication it can be.

Thanks for all of your hard work.

Everyone may not appreciate the job we do, but the level of commitment and effort our staff gives to this paper on a daily basis always astounds me.

Knowing that, I'm confident that The Collegian will be an institution on this campus for many more years to come.

Michael King was The Collegian editor in chief. He is now officially retired.

But people go to college to figure out what they want and who they want to become. Not everyone achieves those goals. I did. And I owe The Collegian for that.

Nobody wants to read 800 words of me getting all misty-eyed about what the Collegian means to me.

Too bad.

Unless you work here, it's hard to fully grasp what being a part of this paper entails: how important it is to all of us, how much time and energy it consumes and how many beers it drives us to consume (partly joking).

Over the past three-plus years, I've written more than 300 stories, interviewed coaches and players countless times, covered hundreds of games from Amherst to Williamsburg, Va., strung for several other newspapers and met the best friends I'll ever have in my life.

Because of that, it's taken me more than the allotted four years of college my parents planned for to finish my degree.(sorry about that, by the way). And because I was constantly traveling all over New England (and beyond) to cover games on the weekend, I missed a lot of what college has to offer.

Think about it. Every Sunday we had mandatory Collegian meetings; I had to work the sports desk from 5 p.m. to approximately midnight two days a week; depending on the sport that I was the beat writer for, I had to cover one to three games per week (entailing previews, game recaps and either a notebook or sidebar for each game) and then there were also mid-week interviews with coaches and players. Being the sports editor is a busy time.

Looking back, it's impossible not to feel some regret about not being a typical college student. I wish I had worked harder in my classes and I, not coincidentally, wish I had a better rapport with my professors. I wish I had tried more new things and I wish I had had more time to go out and just have fun.

But people go to college to figure out what they want and who they want to become. Not everyone achieves those goals. I did. And I owe The Collegian for that.

And for a whole lot more.

The Collegian gave me so many things: real-life sports writing experience that no other college in the country could truly match, an internship at The Daily Hampshire Gazette, the thrill of covering games at places like Madison Square Garden, Fenway Park, Carrier Dome and The Palestra, articles in The Boston Herald and other well-known publications and people that will always be a big part of my life.

But it's even because The Collegian owes me plenty – my five-hours-per-week paycheck didn't exactly cover my 40-plus hours per week that I worked here or the more than $2,000 I spent on gas, hotels and food in my career traveling to games to cover for the paper.

As my Collegian and college career can attest, I could pretty much go on forever here. This place means more to me than you could ever know. It's helped me grow and improve as a journalist and as a person and I have an infinite amount of memories that The Collegian has given to me. I'll hold on to those for myself and spare you.

In the meantime, I could give you the same advice that everyone gives when they leave college, but I won't. You've heard it before. However, I will ask one thing of you if you are returning to UMass next year: READ THE COLLEGIAN! And not just for the Soduku and crossword puzzle, please.

This is easily one of the best college newspapers in the country and it's something special that has been a part of this school since 1890. Take advantage of our hard work, sit back, read,and enjoy.

But even thouagh The Collegian has literally been my life for the past three years, it doesn't define the person that I am. And I'm so appreciative of my parents for giving me five years to figure out who that person is. I'd also like to thank all my friends and colleagues here, who somehow put up with all my antics. Not an easy job, I'm sure.

I'd be remiss if I didn't also mention professor Nick McBride of the journalism department for being a role model and father figure to me at UMass. And also Gazette writer and Collegian Hall of Famer Matt Vautour, a friend who has given me something and someone to aspire to. Thanks, Matt.

If I become half the person and journalist that he is, I owe the Collegian much more than I originally thought.

Eli Rosenswaike was the sports editor. He can be reached at eli.rosenswaike@gmail.com.

Down at the paper I found some of the best friends I will ever meet, the worst fights I've ever had, the place I cried over the most, the place where my away message has pinned me at the most, and created a lifelong love affair with reading and writing.

Everybody changes – the guy sitting next to you in chemistry, the girl blabbing on her cell phone and even the once mousy nerd who decided to venture to the University of Massachusetts.

The second I hit this campus I changed. I was gunning to escape my small hometown of Princeton, Mass., and I knew college was a time to reinvent myself. I lived with a bunch of other people who liked to read and write, laugh and liked me for me – and then that all changed, too.

The second I walked into The Massachusetts Daily Collegian during my sophomore year, that windowless basement of the Campus Center, I knew it was the place for me. Being naturally inquisitive, I thought reporting would be a great way to build up some professional writing skills, killer clips and maybe one day find a job instead of living life in a cardboard box castle.

I knew I wanted to be an editor. Not just at The Collegian, but in life after college. Even that might upgrade me to at least a nice, woodland shack.

At The Collegian I found what I needed most: a change of college scenery. Down at the paper I found some of the best friends I will ever meet, the worst fights I've ever had, the place I cried over the most, the place where my away message has pinned me at the most, and created a lifelong love affair with reading and writing. Now here I am, on the executive board of The Collegian, wondering what's going to change next – in my life and in the bigger world – especially the realm of print media.

I have my heart set on working with books being a book editor, in fact. But like the newspaper business, print publishing is changing radically and its future depends on that change.As newspapers, magazines, journal articles, books and even business memos, move to the computer screen, with one click of a button the print publishing field is being forced to update and modernize their business of producing a physical text to avoid the fear of becoming outdated, unwanted and obsolete. It's a scary concept for some people, especially those who enjoy the feel and smell of the pages between their fingers.

But I like the Internet. And I like printing a paper.

Marshall Poe, a professor who published his scholarly text as an e-book said, "As far as I can tell … a digital picture of a naked lady is still a picture of a naked lady. But, so many of my colleagues tell me, a digital book is not really a book."

The realm of convergence has no limits, is colorful – and at least in my belief – is at many times just as authoritative as a book.

So print isn't dead yet, folks. It's just undergoing a change, a renovation, a new stage in its professional life.My work on this campus at The Collegian and at the University of Massachusetts Press (to whom I owe my endless gratitude) has been a real-life experience into a changing world of print media. Books – just like generations of human beings – have been forced to grow up and adapt to changing cultural values for years and so will those who create them.

Hopefully, that's a change I can be a small part of.

For the indoors kids: Summer video games

'Guitar Hero,' 'Batman' highlight upcoming releases

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

Blockbuster sequels dominated this past school year with titles such as "Gears of War 2," "Resistance 2," and "Resident Evil 5." While the latter of the three was extremely successful, the other two essentially added more storyline to a few already effective games. "Killzone 2," however, brought some fresh blood to the scene and now has over a million online players.

All the games left fans with nothing less than satisfaction, but there's no question that pseudo-amateur (redundant?) rock stars had the most eventful and consequently damaging year.

Roughly 11 new and "unique" interactive music games were released in the past eight months for nearly every console out there.

Like the pog craze, it became so popular so fast that video game publishers all over found ways to wiggle by copyright laws to get in on the hype. This isn't just about digital classic rock cover bands either; "Dance Dance Revolution" and "SingStar" fans are victims, too.

In an attempt to fill every teenager's closet with plastic instruments and interactive dance mats, a handful of rumors developed that certain controllers and accessories were made specifically to not be compatible with competitors' games. This all, of course, discouraged the former air-guitarists, karaoke stars and hop-scotchers who were already sick of the songs from their original investments.

The fad that was "Guitar Hero" expire following the release of "Guitar Hero: Aerosmith" last summer, and again after the recent release of "Guitar Hero: Metallica." The Internet is currently abuzz about a rumor of a "Guitar Hero: Van Halen" supposedly in the works.

"Rock Band" released a Wal-Mart exclusive, and therefore fruitless, AC/DC track pack, and has confirmed rumored plans for an upcoming kid-friendly "LEGO Rock Band."

"SingStar" expanded its mildly successful series with a new game featuring 25 of ABBA's greatest hits.

Needless to say, the genre has spread itself too thin and it's inevitably going to only get worse. Now that the number of "Guitar Hero" titles is reaching "Land Before Time" redundancy, its massive fan base seems to be growing less interested by the day.

Since you weren't trying to get through the first five seconds of "DragonForce" on the expert setting anymore, you were probably too busy blowing the heck out of animated zombies and mythical creatures to lose your virginities this year. Lucky for you, this summer's video game lineup – which is dominated by movie-based games, along with some more "Guitar Hero" rip-offs – is sure to leave you with no choice but to finally go outside into the sun and meet real people.

June 16 marks the release of "Guitar Hero: Smash Hits," which is in essence a "greatest hits" expansion game that offers, some new concert venues to play in. But who cares? Your eyes become so affixed to the mesmerizing circles that the stupid background becomes obsolete, anyway.

For newer GH fans, however, the game actually seems like a pretty good idea. The set list features songs from Guitar Hero games I, II, and III as well as a handful from the "Rock the 80s" expansion pack.

The game includes 48 tracks all together featuring classics like "Bark at the Moon," "YYZ," and of course "Through the Fire and Flames." (DragonForce fans, sorry, your demons are back, which means you probably won't be indulging in that aforementioned thing called "summer"). Shockingly, however, the game lacks any ZZ Top, Guns N' Roses or Allman Brothers numbers.

Oh yeah, "Free Bird" is back, too. "Rock Band" will release what has the potential to be a very popular expansion game called "The Beatles Rock Band" on Sept. 9. No official press release regarding a set list or any further details about the game has been made available, but the title alone has attracted a lot of attention for the game.

"Guitar Hero" fans fool around while trying out the new game in the store. The new game, "Guitar Hero: Smash Hits" features 48 tracks spanning each of the franchise's offerings, including classics like "YYZ," "Free Bird" and "Bark at the Moon."

In its traditional manner, the newest Madden NFL game will be released in mid-August to swarming crowds of jersey-wearing, hormonal teenage boys.

Since his recent retirement from broadcasting, John Madden will not be fumbling and bumbling through the color commentary during the game as he has before. This should bring a hidden yet respectful tear to the eyes of many of the game's fans, while pleasing many others.

NFL players have been wary of appearing on the cover of the perennially successful game in fear of the dreaded "Madden Curse." According to legend (and fact), the athlete will suffer a horrible injury and/or have a remarkably ineffective season after appearing on the game's cover.

EA Sports, in an apparent attempt to finally end chatter about the Curse, has announced for the first time ever there will be two NFL stars on the cover. The tag team of inescapably unlucky bachelors includes Arizona's Larry Fitzgerald and Pittsburgh's Troy Polamalu. What are the chances that they both have bad years?

The dog days of summer have something new to offer this year, though as the abundantly advertised "Batman: Arkham Asylum" is set for a late-August release date.

The game was announced recently after the immeasurable success of Christopher Nolan's "The Dark Knight," even though the two have no affiliation beyond the obvious use of Batman as the protagonist and a variety of his famous villains.

Screenshots of the highly touted game illustrate outstandingly artful and realistic animation.

Paul Dini, a former writer, producer and editor of "Batman: The Animated Series" and "Batman Beyond," has written the script for the game. Those who grew up watching these Batman cartoons should be in for a treat with this dark, yet nostalgic game, which features criminals to the likes of the Joker, the Riddler, Killer Croc, Bane and more.

This past August, Game Informer Magazine featured an in-depth article about the "Batman: Arkham Asylum" game comparing its aesthetics to that of the popular dystopian game, "BioShock."

Unfortunately for all of you Wii owners out there, the game will only be available on PlayStation 3 and Xbox 360.

Don't fret quite yet my little Wii-jects, reminiscence will be available to nearly all gamers on June 16. If you aren't investing half a Benjamin on "Guitar Hero: Smash Hits," then make sure you scrounge up enough change to at least rent "Ghostbusters: The Video Game."

The game, which is based directly on the "Ghostbusters" film series, features Dan Aykroyd, Bill Murray, Harold Ramis and Ernie Hudson starring as and voicing the characters they made famous in the 1980s. Both Rick Moranis and Sigourney Weaver will not, however, be in the game.

The game has promise and looks to be well done, but, historically, video games based on any movie, especially classics, tend to fail miserably (See "The Godfather").

A few other notable titles set for release this summer are the PS3 exclusive third-person action game "Infamous" and the old Western epic "Red Dead Redemption."

So go get your electronic artificial drum kits out, stock up on Hi-C Ecto Cooler, and enjoy the summer.

D.C. rapper Wale lights up Pearl Street despite tardiness

Opening acts flop during lengthy wait period

By Ian Nelson
Collegian Staff

Sunday night was a night of stalling at the Pearl Street Nightclub. The main act, Washington, D.C.'s premier hip-hop ambassador Wale, took hours to finally hit the stage, finally relieving the crowd of its duty of cringing through most of the opening acts.

This may be a bit too extreme of a judgment – there were some pleasant surprises that made the night bearable and even memorable, but a large chunk of the show, sponsored by Northampton's Unite Footwear and Apparel, was dedicated to uninspired acts and awkward interaction between the stage and the audience.

The first surprise of the evening came right away as, after a brief introduction to the show by the evening's MC Rec, Detroit's Big Sean appeared onstage. The show certainly had not been advertising Big Sean on the bill, but apparently Wale decided to take him on tour. Big Sean is best known as a member of Kanye West's G.O.O.D. Music label. According to Sean's MySpace, the rapper met West in 2005 through Detroit radio station 102.7FM where he freestyled for him.

Eventually Sean gained notoriety for his mic skills and his song "Getcha Some" was featured on West's 2007 "Can't Tell Me Nothing" mixtape. The song also appears on Sean's mixtape "Finally Famous." Sean performed five tracks, including "Getcha Some" to end his energetic set.

The night then went into a downward spiral after a brief freestyle battle. D.C. quartet Spirit Animal were close to horrendous, chugging out some clunking form of nu metal mixed with failed attempts at rap rock. Their frontman, known as the Gray Kid, pranced around stage like a caricature of a romantic comedy villain, splitting his vocals between poor rapping, angry bellows and trying to sing.

Toward the end of their set the Gray Kid announced he had two more songs. "No more songs!" an audience member demanded. While Spirit Animal went on with their final songs, few were happy with it.

Next, Colin Munroe took the stage to perform three songs – an awful rendition of Kanye West's "Flashing Lights," "Cannonball," a track he did with Drake (currently mentored by Lil' Wayne, also of "Degrassi" fame), and another which was hardly memorable.

After these two disappointing acts (one of which was not on the bill), one would expect Wale to save the night. This was not the case yet.

The following hour consisted of another rap battle that failed (Rec called for two female MCs, but he only got one and she said nothing except "meow"), another battle that succeeded (one participant commented on high drink prices at the bar) and another appearance by Big Sean who freestyled and then proceeded to dive into an autograph signing fit. He signed everything – fliers, posters, ticket stubs, hands, hats, even shoes.

Rec then stretched the wait even further, even calling a couple of members of the crowd to come up and tell jokes, which were awful. After endless attempts to pump up the crowd and get them to yell for Wale, the rapper's Go-Go band UCB filed onstage. Eventually the lights dimmed and D.C.'s finest finally materialized.

UCB dazzled, pounding out funky island rhythms with the help of a raging set of congas manned by a gentleman referred to only as "Slump."

Right away, Wale let the audience know he was making up a song on the spot. He gave Pearl Street three options as to what he would rattle off a song about. In so many words, the choices were women, alcohol, and marijuana. After multiple inquiries to the audience to find out what the theme would be, Wale decided he was too drunk to tell what vice the people were cheering for. No matter, he made up a song about all three.

Wale went on to perform "Rising Up," the track he cut with the Roots last year, as well as "The Feature Heavy Song" and "The Artistic Integrity" from his "Seinfeld"-themed "Mixtape About Nothing."

Toward the end of Wale's set, the performance once again devolved into autograph signing, as Wale and Big Sean armed themselves with Sharpies to take on hoards of fans with outstretched arms, hopeful of getting something inked.

The whole show ended rather abruptly, house lights illuminating before Wale even left the stage. This whirlwind night of ups and downs was surely something to remember, just not as a whole. Wale's set stands as a lesson, however – "fashionably late" is still in.

Trio follows up 'Idiot'

New record "21st Century Breakdown," Green Day's first album since 2004's pop smash "American Idiot," his shelves Friday. The band has come a long way from its first major success, 1994's "Dookie."

'21st Century Breakdown' served as 3-part rock opera

By Greg Kot
Chicago Tribune

Perhaps the only thing more unlikely than releasing a rock opera in 2009 is that it's a rock opera written and recorded by Green Day. But such is the case with "21st Century Breakdown" (Reprise, 3 stars), which arrives in stores Friday.

Green Day is that rare beast: a band that still sells lots of albums in an MP3-obsessed, iPod era. And rarer still, the band makes albums that demand to be heard as a whole: a collection of conceptually linked songs that is greater than the sum of its parts.

The northern California trio's previous album, the 2004 release "American Idiot," was a song cycle about life during wartime. In the grand punk tradition of Reagan-era stalwarts the Minutemen, the Meat Puppets and Husker Du, Green Day succeeded in making an album that spoke to and about its generation at a time of political anxiety, fear and anger. Unlike those bands, Green Day was an unmitigated hit. During a decade when CD sales plummeted, "American Idiot" sold nearly 6 million copies domestically and 12 million worldwide.

Now comes the even more ambitious "21st Century Breakdown," nothing less than a three-part rock opera that traces the story of two characters, Christian and Gloria, the yin and yang of singer-guitarist Billie Joe Armstrong's personality.

Christian is a rabble-rouser with his finger hovering on the self-destruct button. Gloria is an idealist with hopes of remaking the world.

The album would be a manifesto for a generation trying to make a sense of overseas wars and a hometown recession. Thankfully, Armstrong avoids sermonizing. But he does have a few things to get off his chest, and he and his band express themselves with do-or-die boldness. In Green Day's early days, Armstrong saw many of the same problems and rolled his eyes. He's a product of the early '90s pop-punk brigade, a generation of disenfranchised suburbanites who broadcast their discontent in pithy three-chord anthems. They were bored and stoned; they reacted to the world around them with a shrug of the shoulders, a smirk and a series of one-fingered salutes. Green Day harnessed that disenchantment

See BREAKDOWN on page 7

Green Day forget pop-punk

on the 1994 landmark "Dookie," a 15-million-selling juggernaut of bratty black humor.

As the band aged, it started to recycle itself, and sales dropped. No great sin; plenty of bands struggle to maintain relevance. But a funny thing happened on the way to the nostalgia circuit with "American Idiot." As the band members turned past 30 and began settling down, they got not just older but better. Armstrong raised his aim as a songwriter, and bassist Mike Dirnt and drummer Tre Cool kept pace. The trio are omnivorous music fans, and as their range and interests broadened, their music did too.

Green Day reinvented itself with "American Idiot"; the album's seriousness and ambition would've been unimaginable coming from the band that made "Dookie." "21st Century Breakdown" aims higher, a state-of-the-disunion address delivered by two kids wandering through a landscape where war rages, jobs are scarce and cities slowly disintegrate. At times, Armstrong's earnestness sounds like a Springsteen parody ("She puts her makeup on/ Like graffiti on the walls of the heartland"); he hasn't quite mastered the art of the telling detail the way someone like the Hold Steady's Craig Finn has. And the humor of the "Dookie" era is missed. In its place is a far richer and more varied brand of musical expression.

Armstrong addresses his own generation ("born into Nixon") and the next, as represented by his oldest son's anticipated high school graduating class ("the class of 13"), but he doesn't pretend to have answers. He ventures only one piece of advice: "Silence is the enemy / Against your urgency," he brays in "Know Your Enemy." In other words, participate or perish. That sums up the tone of the album, and presents the biggest difference between the new Green Day and the old, the one that celebrated slacker indifference on "Dookie" and the one that challenges a generation of listeners to engage with the world around them on "21st Century Breakdown."

One thing hasn't changed: The music rocks, only now the snotty, faux-British accent has been replaced by a full-throated cry that owes as much to classic rock as it does to basement punk. Tre Cool has always been the band's secret weapon, his unrelenting drumming the driving force in songs that push higher and harder. But the dynamics have sharpened, the contrasts have become more vivid, thanks to the expansive production of Butch Vig (who has worked with Nirvana and the Smashing Pumpkins).

Now there are intimations of Brecht-Weill cabaret ("Viva La Gloria") and John Lennon-esque piano ballads ("Last Night on Earth"). Strings and timpani embellish the arrangements, and keyboards provide a breather between guitar-based assaults.

The exuberant pop-punk of old has morphed into epic Who-style stadium rock, with thundering drums underpinning windmill chords and shout-from-the-rooftops choruses. Rock operas demand nothing less, and Green Day delivers.

On its new record "21st Century Breakdown," Green Day has dropped its pop-punk roots in order to explore more stadium territory.

Reflections on memorable year

how Cannella, the coach of the men's lacrosse team, is the ultimate leader for a program. Read that column and you'll know why he won our men's coach of the year.

Cannella is the epitome of a class act and does things the right way. That's why the off-campus incident involving eight players before the 2008 season was such a shock. Cannella and the Minutemen overcame that and had a tremendous 2009 season, culminating in the ECAC championship and NCAA Tournament appearance. Cannella reinstated two of the suspended players, reunited the team and restored the image of the men's lacrosse team – all while bringing back the program into national prominence.

TOP 10 GAMES

Men's lacrosse at Rutgers – So much on the line. A win gives the Minutemen the ECAC championship and the automatic qualifier in the NCAA Tournament. A loss means the resurgent season ends. Want added pressure? How about if the first goal in overtime wins the whole thing?

After Rutgers won the faceoff they stormed down the field looking for the game-winner. Doc Schneider saved it and moments later Tim Balise hit a turnaround bounce shot as the Minutemen celebrated the 11-10 victory.

Women's lacrosse vs. Saint Joseph's (A-10 Championship Game)—The exact same situation that the men's lacrosse team was in against Rutgers. And exact same result.

The Minutewomen trailed by as many as seven goals to the underdog Hawks, but quickly stormed back to make a game of it. Led by Jackie Lyons' five goals and three assists, UMass tied it and forced overtime. Lyons was the one who tied it and won it, scoring the game-winner on a free position shot with eight seconds left in overtime for the 15-14 dramatic win.

Men's lacrosse at Hobart – Did he get the shot off in time? According to the referees, Tim Balise did, as the Minutemen scored the game-tying goal with less than one second remaining in regulation.

Balise was the hero for a mere 23 seconds, as Jim Connolly scored the game-winner before you could say, "Holy Cow," to claim the key conference game, 7-6, in overtime. Without that win, UMass doesn't win the conference or make the NCAA tournament.

Men's basketball vs. Boston College – Down by two with four seconds left to play and headed to the line for two free throws, Chris Lowe misses the first, so he's forced to miss the second one intentionally. But that never works.

Tony Gaffney somehow made sure that it did. He fought for the rebound and tipped the ball – and it spun around the rim and went down as timer expired. So what if they lost in overtime?

Men's basketball at Saint Joseph's – This game had more lead changes in the final minutes than we could count. It came down to the final seconds and (somehow, someway) the Minutemen actually came out on the winning end after a number of last-second losses.

As 6,522 fans screamed at the top of their lungs while Lowe headed to the line for two shots, the senior calmly sank both to give UMass the thrilling 70-69 win at The Palestra, considered to be the most famous venue in all of college basketball.

Men's basketball at Kansas – It was a off year for the men's basketball team, but they sure played in a lot of great games. This was another one.

They beat the defending national champions and No. 25 Jayhawks, 61-60, and on the road, no less.

Hockey at Northeastern (Hockey East playoffs Game 3) – This game provided a dramatic conclusion to a thrilling first-round series.

Matt Irwin gave the Minutemen belief they could pull off the massive upset when he tied the game at 2 with 34.8 seconds in the third period to force overtime But the Huskies scored the series-winner midway through the extra session to end UMass' season.

Men's soccer vs. Harvard (NCAA Tournament Round 1) – The goal that wasn't?

In overtime of a scoreless game against Harvard at Rudd Field on a ridiculously cold day, the Minutemen appeared to have the game-winner, but the officials ruled that the ball didn't cross the goal line. Collegian photographer Maxwell Sparr had a picture of it, and it appears that the ball did and it should have given UMass the win.

The goal that was … Harvard scored minutes later to end UMass' season. Perhaps the worst part of it was the fact that Harvard's Andre Akpan didn't even try to score on the play. His attempted cross snuck into the goal.

Women's basketball vs. Manhattan – Trailing by 24 points against Manhattan wasn't exactly the way the Minutewomen wanted to start their season. UMass trailed 38-14 with 5 minutes, 28 seconds left in the first half.

And it still trailed by 16 points with 13:11 left, but minutes later they trailed by four. It went back-and-forth the rest of the way but a foul shot by Sakera Young gave UMass the win with two seconds left.

Field hockey vs. Syracuse – A meeting with undefeated and second-ranked Syracuse didn't seem like an easy proposition – especially with a 4-0 deficit after the first period.

But UMass proved that it belonged on the same field with the nation's elite and hung tough in the second half to cut the lead to 5-4 with seven minutes left. The Orange held off for the win, but UMass used that game as a step-pingstone to what turned out to be an incredible season.

HONORABLE MENTION: Football against Maine (UMass loses by one on missed extra-point), Baseball versus Fairfield and vs. Richmond (Minutemen score 25 vs. Stags and 24 vs. Richmond), Hockey against Boston College (UMass wins in overtime vs. No. 4 Eagles), Men's soccer against Boston University and versus Saint Louis (UMass wins in double overtime over rival Terriers, and in double OT vs. the Billikens).

PERFORMANCES OF THE YEAR

Cruz catches fire – On Sept. 13 against James Madison, WR Victor Cruz was unstoppable.

Cruz caught 13 passes for 262 yards and two touchdowns to shatter the school's receiving record. He carried the Minutemen's passing attack almost singlehandedly. The rest of the team caught 13 passes, for a combined 77 yards.

Despite his efforts UMass lost a 52-38 shootout to JMU, but that doesn't erase Cruz's amazing individual performance.

Tony's near triples – After the Minutemen lost to Memphis 80-58, UMass coach Derek Kellogg said he wished he had one more Tony Gaffney in the game.

He could've used another Gaffney all season. The senior's 16-point, 19 rebound, five-block performance against then-No. 12 Memphis was spectacular, but it wasn't a fluke.

He proved that with follow-up performances against Jacksonville State (20 points, 13 boards, eight blocks), Boston College (15, 18, nine), Holy Cross (17, 11, eight).

Connolly 7, Yale 6 – After enduring two consecutive losses to Yale in the past two years, Jim Connolly decided he had had enough.

Jim Connolly outscored the entire Bulldog offense in the Minutemen's 18-6 victory over Yale. His seven goals were a career high and one shy of the school record in a win that proclaimed to the rest of the country that UMass had turned the corner since its disastrous 2008 season.

Balise saves season – The stakes couldn't have been higher in UMass' final regular season game against Rutgers on May 2. Win and they clinch the Eastern College Athletic Conference championship and an NCAA Tournament berth, lose and the season is over.

That day Tim Balise had arguably the best game of his career, scoring five goals including the championship-winner in overtime in the Minutemen's 11-10 win.

His performance was the benchmark to a senior season that saw him score 30 goals and help heal some of the wounds from the infamous 2008 season.

Lyons leads pack – When the game was on the line, Jackie Lyons' teammates knew she would come through.

Lyons scored the game-winning goal with 8.9 seconds left in overtime, capping a five-goal three-assist performance to lead UMass to a 15-14 win against Saint Joseph's in the Atlantic 10 championship game.

Lyons was named the A-10 Tournament's MVP for her effort, which helped UMass erase an early 10-3 deficit.

Balschmiter fans 19 – In a game where the Minutewomen's offense wasn't at its best, Brandice Balschmiter had to be dominant.

She was exactly that in the Minutewomen's 3-2 win in extra innings over George Washington. Balschmiter set a school record by recording 19 strikeouts with no walks against the Colonials. She needed every one of them to give the next person on the list a chance to win the game.

Salato goes deep x 7 – That person is Samantha Salato, who hit two home runs, including the game-winning homer eighth against George Washington.

Those homers were part of a ridiculous April in which Salato crushed nine homers on her way to tying the single-season home run record of 15.

Normandin drives in seven – Coming off an 11-6 loss to Charlotte on April 26, their first loss in the A-10 in 49 games, Elaine Sortino felt the team needed to regain its focus in the team's game against Rhode Island.

Carly Normandin led by example, driving in a record-tying seven runs in the Minutewomen's 13-0 mercy rule win over Rhode Island.

That performance along with her stellar overall season in which she lead the team in batting average (.426 ) runs (49), hits (66), and stolen bases (20) earned her recognition as the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year.

BREAKOUT PLAYERS OF THE YEAR

Tony Gaffney – Senior forward Tony Gaffney came a long way, going from just some guy to the guy over the course of a couple seasons.

Starting at Boston University, Gaffney was an unheralded transfer that, entering his senior year, did not have a lot of expectations placed upon him.

Oh, how things change.

The 2008-09 A-10 Defensive Player of the Year, team MVP, and Collegeinsider.com Defensive All-American Team, numbers skyrocketed in his final season at UMass, going from 3.2 points and 4.8 rebounds per game to 11.2 points and 10.2 rebounds per game.

Carly Normandin – Last season, Carly Normandin was third on the UMass squad with a .324 average, a respectable mark. However, that mark was nothing compared to the .426 average she currently boasts.

Normandin broke out this season by going from a good offensive player on a strong team to arguably the best player on the team. And that's saying a lot considering that Brandice Balschmiter is still pitching.

In 2009, Normandin has led the team in almost every offensive statistical category.

2008-09 Collegian Awards

Tony Gaffney went from a bench player in his junior year to the heart and soul of the basketball team in his senior year. He had 16 points and 19 rebounds, five blocks and three steals against then No. 12 Memphis.

Brandice Balschmiter prepares to deliver a pitch. Balschmiter set a new UMass record with 19 strikeouts in the Minutewomen's 3-2 win in extra innings against George Washington.

The Men's lacrosse team celebrates its ECAC championship after clinching the title with an 11-10 victory over Rutgers. Tim Balise scored five goals including the overtime winner in performance of the year

The women's lacrosse team poses after clinching its first Atlantic 10 Championship since 1984 with a 15-14 overtime win over Saint Joseph's. UMass coach Alexis Venechanos, far left, is honored as coach of the year.

TOP 10 STORYLINES

Men's lacrosse program's comeback season – A 7-7 record in 2007 after making the national championship game in 2006, eight players getting kicked off the team before 2008, a 5-9 finish in 2008 – and then a resurgent 2009 season that saw the men's lacrosse program return to the NCAA Tournament and national prominence.

Baseball program rumors/skiing cut – For a while it seemed like the baseball program would be cut due to a budget deficit at UMass. Next think you know, the men's and women's skiing programs are cut instead.

Derek Kellogg's first year as UMass coach – Travis Ford bolted for Oklahoma State. Enter UMass' own, Derek Kellogg.

They teased fans with wins over Kansas and some of the elite teams in the A-10, but several last-second losses and defeats to teams like Jacksonville State and Toledo left everyone scratching their heads in a disappointing 12-18 season.

Football happenings – A preseason No. 3 ranking resulted in a 7-5 record and a rare absence from the postseason. Then-coach Don Brown resigns to take the defensive coordinator position at Maryland and Kevin Morris, the quarterbacks coach, is elevated to the top job at UMass.

Women's lacrosse recovers from adversity – After several players, including 2008 star Kaytlin McCormick, quit the team after last season, 2009 looked as though it would be a down season with so many newcomers.

But it was not so, as UMass won the Atlantic 10 Tournament in dramatic fashion and reached the NCAA Tournament for the first time since 1984.

Field hockey team rises to prominence – UMass had a good year in 2007 under first-year coach Justine Sowry, but the Minutewomen took it to another level this season. With senior leaders like Erin Parker, Katelyn Orlando and Mary Shea, UMass won the NCAA play-in game and then lost a heartbreaker, 3-2, to Syracuse. With Sowry and star freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall in net for the next three years, this team will be among the nation's elite for a while.

Tony Gaffney explodes from nowhere – 2007-08 stats: 3.2 PPG, 4.8 RPG, 1.69 BPG in 20 minutes per night. And now a year later he has a chance to make the NBA. Amazing.

Atlantic 10 Tournament blues continue – For the seventh season in a row, the Massachusetts men's basketball team lost in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. Since then, all 13 teams in the conference have won at least won game.

Brandice Balschmiter rewrites record books – She got her 1,000th career strikeout. She set a school record with 19 strikeouts in one game. She broke the school-record for most career wins. The list goes on and on for perhaps the best pitcher in UMass softball history.

Matt Goldstein-Whitney Mollica – If you have the guts to get on one knee and propose to your girlfriend at the place of your employment and in front of 4,621 people – you make this list. It's that simple. Congratulations to Matt (who does the PA at hockey games) and to Whitney, who has had a terrific four-year career as the third baseman on the softball team.

TOP 5 MOMENTS

Lowe's got ice water in his veins – With only two seconds remaining in a 69-68 game at St. Joseph's, Chris Lowe stepped to the line with a chance to give the Minutemen the lead. With a capacity crowd at the Palestra going wild, making every effort to distract Lowe, the senior calmly sank both shots, leading UMass to a 70-69 win.

It was a key win for the Minutemen who, at the time, were still fighting for a spot in the A-10 tournament.

Gaffney's tip turns the tables – Despite some early season collapses late for the Minutemen, UMass coach Derek Kellogg's team was able to pull off some last-minute heroics.

During the waning seconds of UMass' game against Boston College, Gaffney supplied a miracle tip-in off a missed foul shot to send the game into overtime. The Minutemen ultimately lost the game, but Gaffney's play kept the game alive for UMass.

The goal that wasn't – During the second overtime period of UMass' NCAA match against Harvard, freshman Chris Roswess fired a shot toward a crowd at the front of the net where a Minuteman barely tipped it across the line as … never mind.

What appeared to be the game-winning goal for UMass was not, as the referees determined that the ball didn't cross the line before being kicked away by Harvard goalie Austin Harms. The implications of the non-goal were obvious as UMass went on to lose the game 1-0, ending their tournament hopes.

Irwin scores with seconds left – With under a minute left in Game 3 of the Hockey East tournament, it appeared that the Northeastern Huskies would close out the series. However, with 34.8 seconds remaining, it was freshman defenseman Matt Irwin that beat out Brad Theissen to tie the game 2-2.

UMass went on to lose the game in overtime, but still gave it a chance to get back into game and upset the Huskies.

Men and Women's lax clinch in OT – Clinching a postseason berth came down to the last second for both the men's and women's lacrosse teams.

The Minutewomen, who were tied at 14-14 in overtime in their A-10 championship match against Saint Joseph's, were saved through the efforts of sophomore sensation Jackie Lyons, who recorded her eighth point of the game to send UMass to the NCAA tournament.

For the Minutemen, it was senior Tim Balise that extended the season. Tied at 10-10 in overtime against Rutgers, the Minutemen were the beneficiaries of a bounce shot from Balise that found the back of the net and gave UMass the ECAC title and a trip to the tournament.

TOP 5 MALE ATHLETES

James Marcou – It's safe to say that without the sophomores scoring touch and knack for clutch performances, the Massachusetts hockey team wouldn't have made it to the Hockey East Tournament this season.

Marcou led the Minutemen with 15 goals and 32 assists – good for 12th in the nation with 47 points. He was one of the few Minutemen that continued to score while the rest suffered from cold streaks, which undoubtedly shortened UMass' season and hurt its tournament ranking. Fortunately for the Mass Attack, Marcou still has a couple of more seasons in him.

Tony Gaffney – The senior was the backbone of the Massachusetts basketball team. When the Minutemen found itself in trouble Gaffney was there to bail them out. Gaffney averaged a double-double while leading UMass in playing time, with almost 34 minutes per game.

A true definition of a senior leader, Gaffney was the voice of motivation and optimism at times when the season looked all but lost. His last-second lay-up against Boston College on Dec. 6 pretty much summed the season for the 6-8, 200-pounder – he was always there when his team needed him.

Doc Schneider – We still don't know how he got his nickname, but that's all right, he gave us enough to talk about in his four years here. Schneider started in all 16 of UMass' games in his final season as goalkeeper. The five-time ECAC Defensive Player of the Week led the conference in save percentage (.653) and goals-against average (7.43).

The senior continued to earn praise even after defeats. Princeton coach Bill Tierney hailed Schneider as one of the best goalies in the country even after scoring in double figures. Sounds pretty good to me.

Zack Simmons – To start off, being in FIFA '09 has to be one of the coolest achievements ever as well as one of the best pickup lines. Trust me, I've played against him virtually, he's not that bad. But beside that, back-up goalkeeper Shane Curran-Hays has a lot to live up to.

There isn't much to say about Simmons that hasn't been said, however. The senior started all 21 games for the Minutemen posting a .84 GAA and stopping 84 shots on the season. Oh, and in the classroom, Simmons has nearly a 4.0 GPA and is pursuing two majors.

Jason Cooke – Usually your freshman year is a time to get settled, learn the program, the coach and the playing style. But for freshman Jason Cook it seemed as if he learned all of that years ago. Cook was named the Atlantic 10's Most Outstanding Diver and finished first in 16 different races this season. He was the first diver in UMass history to compete in the NCAA Diving Championships.

There's already a lot this young swimmer has accomplished and he has three more years to add to his résumé.

TOP 5 FEMALE ATHLETES

Alesha Widdall – The sophomore took over the reins as the Massachusetts field hockey team's starting keeper last fall. Widdall started in 18 of UMass' 22 games posting a 1.06 GAA and a .792 save percentage. She already has seven shutouts to her credit and after leading UMass to the NCAA Tournament and nearly upsetting Syracuse in the first round the Minutemen will look to go deeper in the postseason next year.

Katelyn Orlando – Another big reason as to why the Minutewomen advanced to the NCAA tournament. The senior was named the A-10 Offensive Player of the Year and the only senior forward on the team, so the leadership she provided was vital. Orlando's play really brightened late on in the year as UMass took on conference rivals.

She led the Minutewomen in goals, with 15, and also led the team with 31 points.

Brandice Balschmiter – It seems like every week that Balschmiter seems to break a UMass record or reach another milestone. The senior now owns UMass' all-time win record, strikeout record and has thrown more than one no-hitter this year – all of this done pretty much effortlessly.

Don't tell her that, though. Balschmiter is never satisfied with how she pitches and if she feels like her outing was "OK" then she'll just focus her attention on her team's win instead of how she pitched that day. A-10 teams have to be pleased she's graduating.

Jackie Lyons – Lyons led the Massachusetts lacrosse team in goals (44) and assists (27) as a sophomore. She was named First Team All-A-10 and A-10 Tournament MVP after scoring a combined 13 points in UMass' two victories. Lyons' best game, arguably the most important game of the season, saw her score eight points (five goals, three assists) in overtime in UMass' A-10 Championship win over Saint Joe's.

Carly Normandin/Samantha Salato – It's hard to find faults or weaknesses within the Massachusetts softball team. If Normandin and Salato are anything they are buoys that keep the Minutewomen afloat offensively (so to speak). The two lead UMass in every offensive category and provide Balschmiter with plenty of run support. The two have a combined 81 RBIs or 34 percent of the team's and 105 hits or 29 percent of the team's.

Together, along with Balschmiter, the three could end up carrying the Minutewomen a long way in the NCAA Tournament.

TEAMS OF THE YEAR

Field hockey – If the 2008 Massachusetts field hockey team had one weakness, it was that it struggled against teams ranked in the Top 5 in the nation.

Good problem to have.

Outside of an early season loss to a "pitiful" No. 13 Boston College team and a meaningless, non-conference loss to Providence, the team's three losses came against the No. 2, No. 3 and No. 5-ranked teams in the country.

The truth of the matter is, UMass coach Justine Sowry won the games they were supposed to while still toppling two ranked opponents during the regular season en route to a second consecutive NCAA tournament appearance.

Men's Lacrosse – The UMass men's lacrosse team had a rockier road in returning to the NCAA tournament.

After a preseason incident that resulted in the suspension of eight players, the team completely rebounded, overcoming the criticism to win the ECAC title and reach the NCAA tournament.

Led by goalkeeper Doc Schneider and attack Jim Connolly, the Minutemen were able to battle their way through their tough conference schedule, including devastating losses to Georgetown and Syracuse, and cap off a spectacular season in the face of adversity.

COACHES OF THE YEAR

Alexis Venechanos – When a team loses its top two scorers, its senior goalkeeper and has to integrate 14 freshmen and a walk-on junior onto a roster of 24 players, it's supposed to be a rebuilding year.

Only no one told that to Venechanos.

Before the season she declared that her goal was to make the NCAA tournament; something that hadn't been accomplished since 1984.

It seemed unlikely, especially after the Minutewomen lost their first three games and carried a 3-6 record heading into conference play.

But that record was misleading, Venechanos intentionally scheduled one of the hardest schedules in the country facing five teams ranked in the top 15, reasoning that by the time conference play started, her players would be prepared for anything.

She was right.

The team went 8-1 against A-10 foes, including a 13-12 win over their nemesis Richmond, a 16-4 rout of defending Atlantic 10 champion Temple and a 15-14 overtime win in the A-10 Championship game where the team had to overcome a 10-3 deficit in 90 degree heat.

That championship win defined the type of team Venechanos built. A team prepared to overcome any challenge, and always believe victory was possible – no matter how unlikely it may seem.

Greg Cannella – Recently, there was a column in The Collegian about
